Meyer observes that if any use is to be made of this note of time to fix the date, our reckoning must be made backward from the destruction of the temple, not forward from the restoration of the courses by Judas Maccabæus, because it is not certain what course then began the new order of things; whereas we have a fixed note for the destruction of the temple, that it was on the 9th of Ab, and the course in waiting was that of Jehoiarib. In the phrase ἐντολαῖς κ. δικαίωμασιν (see ref.), we must not press any difference between the terms. δικαίωμα, as Bleek remarks, is used of an ordinance of God, laying down what is δίκαιον for men. προβαίνειν is only found in the classics in this sense with τῇν or κατὰ τῇν ἡλικίαν, or τῇ ἡλικίᾳ. 9, 10.] τοῦ θυμιάσαι (not θυμιάσαι).

a vision at the time of offering incense occurs Jos. Antt. xiii. 10. 3: φασὶ γὰρ ὅτι κατ' ἐκείνην τὴν ἡμέραν καθ' ἣν οἱ παῖδες αὐτοῦ τῷ Κυζικηνῷ συνιβαλον, αὐτὸς ἐν τῷ ναῷ θυμῶν μόνος, ὡν ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς, ἀκούσεις φωνῆς ὡς οἱ παῖδες αὐτοῦ νικητικῶν ἀργίων τὸν Ἀντίοχον. καὶ τοῦτο προελθὼν ἐκ τοῦ ναοῦ παντὶ τῷ πλήθει φανερόν ἐποίησε· καὶ συνίβη οὕτως γενέσθαι. Here also we have the people outside (in the courts of the men and women):—their prayers were offered while the incense was burnt, as the smoke was symbolic of the ascent of prayer, Rev. viii. 3, 4.

It appears, from the allotment having been just mentioned, to have been the morning incense burning. So Meyer. Theophylact and others understand the whole of the entry into the Holy of holies on the great day of Atonement, Levit. xvi. But this is manifestly an error: for it would necessitate Zacharias having been High-priest, which he never was; and in this case there would have been no casting of lots. 11.] The altar of incense, Exod. xxx. 1, must not be confounded with the large altar of burnt-offering: that stood outside the holy place, in the court of the priests. It was during the sacrifice on the great altar that the daily burning of the incense took place: one of the two priests, whose lot it was to offer incense, brought fire from off the altar of burnt-offering to the altar of incense, and then left the other priest there alone,—who, on a signal from the priest presiding at the sacrifice, kindled the incense: see Exod. xl. 5, 26. This is no vision, but an actual angelic appearance. The right is the favourable side: see Matt. xxv. 33. “We must understand the right as regarded the officiating priest, who stood with his face to the altar. It would thus be on the N. side of the holy place, where the table of shew-bread stood, whereas on the S. side was the golden candlestick.” Bleek.

13.] He had then prayed for a son—but as appears below, long since—for he now had ceased to look for an answer to his prayer. Many Commentators (Aug., Thl., Euth., Grot., &c.) have thought his prayer was for the salvation of Israel by the appearance of the Messiah: but the former view appears more probable.

Ἰωάννην = Ἰησοῦν, Ἰωανάν LXX, 1 Chron. iii. 24;—Ἰωνά, 4 Kings xxv. 23;—Ἰωάννης, 2 Chron. xxviii. 12;—= ‘God is favourable.’ 15. ἑνώπιον. τ. κ.] signifying the spiritual nature of his office and influence.

The priests were similarly prohibited to drink strong drink; and the Nazarites even more rigidly: see ref. σίκ. = ῥῆ (from ῥῆψ, ‘inebriatus est’),—‘any strong liquor not made from grapes.’

πν. ἀγ. πλ. is a contrast to, and a reason for, the not drinking wine nor strong drink: compare Eph. v. 18. Olshausen and Meyer think that (comparing ver. 44) the meaning is, the Holy Spirit should in some wonderful manner act on the child even before his birth. But (see reff.) this is not necessary, —nay, would it not rather be in this case ἐν κοιλίᾳ . . . ? The ἐκ seems to fix the prior limit of the indwelling of the Spirit, at his birth. Meyer grounds his view on the meaning of ἐτι as distinguished from ἤδη, and takes the construction as embracing both particulars—he shall be so in, and shall become so from . . . So likewise Bleek, and Hoffmann, Weiss. und Erfüll. ii. 250 f. 18.] The work of John was one of preparation and turning men's hearts towards God. For full notes on his office, see on Matt. xi. It may suffice here to repeat, that it was a concentration of the spirit of the law, whose office it was to convince of sin: and that he eminently represented the law and the prophets in their work of preparing the way for Christ. 17.] ἐν αὐτοῦ—i. e. κυρίου τοῦ θ. αὐτῶν, manifest in the flesh. De Wette denies this interpretation, as contrary to all analogy: and yet himself explains the expression by saying that what the Messiah does, is in Scripture ascribed to God as its doer (similarly Meyer). But why? because Messiah is GOD WITH US. This expression is besides used (see Zech. xiv. 5) in places where the undoubted and sole reference is to the Messiah. See Bleek's note, in which he decides for this view, as against that which refers αὐτοῦ directly to the Messiah as the Son of God. ἐν πν. κ.

δυν.] As a type, a partial fulfilment, of the personal coming of Elias in the latter days (see note on Mt. xi. 13, 14). Bleek remarks that it was not in the wonder-working agency of Elias that John was like him, for "John did no miracle,"—but in the power of his uttered persuasion.

ἐπιστρ. . . .] The first member only of the sentence corresponds with Malachi, and that not verbatim. The angel gives the exposition of the second member,—καὶ καρδίαν ἀνθρώπου πρὸς τὸν πλῆσιον αὐτοῦ,—for of course that must be understood in the better sense, of the good prevailing, and the bad becoming like them.

ἀπειθεῖς, as in reff., not unbelieving, but disobedient. On the verb ἀπειθεῖν, see note, Heb. iii. 18, and on ἀπειθεια, note, Eph. ii. 2.

ἐν is elliptic for εἰς τὸ εἶναι ἐν . . . see reff. Augustine, De Civ. Dei, xx. 29,—'est sensus, ut etiam filii sic intelligent legem, id est, Judaei, quemadmodum patres eam intellexerunt, id est Prophetæ, in quibus erat et ipse Moyses:' so also Kuinoel, but erroneously, for both articles would be expressed,—τῶν πατέρων ἐπὶ τὰ τέκνα. 18.]

The birth of John, involving human generation, but prophetically announced, and supernatural, answers to the birth of Isaac in the O. T.

But Abraham's faith was a strong contrast to the unbelief of Zacharias: see Rom. iv. 19. De Wette, without noticing the above remark (which is Olshausen's), says, "the same doubt, which Abraham also entertained in a similar case;" so that we have here, as often elsewhere, in the interpretation of Scripture (Gen. xv. 6, 8; xvii. 17; xviii. 12), De Wette versus Paul (Rom. as above):—the fact being, that the case Gen. xv. 8 was not similar. πρεσβύτερος.] The Levites (see Num. iv. 3; viii. 24, 25) became superannuated at the age of fifty: but it appears, by extracts from the Rab-

The names of the angels, say the Rabbis, came up with Israel from Babylon. We first read of both Michael and Gabriel in the book of Daniel. But we are not therefore to suppose that they were borrowed from any heathen system, as Strauss and the rationalists have done; the fact being, that the persons and order of the angels were known long before, and their names formed matter of subsequent revelation to Daniel: see Professor Mill's Vindication of Luke i., § 4, and note A; also Josh. v. 13—16. ὁ παρευστ. ἐν. τ. θ.]

It is impossible for us to say what the degree of unbelief in Zacharias was, and therefore we can be no judges as to his being deserving of the punishment (against Strauss and the rationalists). κ. μ. θυ. λαλ.]

The words ἑθαύμαζον ἐν are best taken together, wondered at, as in ref. Sir. They may also be taken separately, taking ἐν as 'during;' and so Meyer: but this is not so probable.

22.] They knew, by some excitement, visible in his manner. It was not his office to pronounce the benediction, but that of the other incensing priest; so that his 'not being able to speak,' must mean, in answer to the enquiries which his unusual appearance prompted. This answer he gave by a sign: and the question was also by signs; for (see ver. 62) he was deaf, as well as dumb, which indeed is the strict meaning of κωφός—οὐτε λαλῶν, οὐτ' ἀκούων, Hesych. 23. ὡς ἐπ' αὐτῷ.] The week during which his course was on duty. Greswell, by much elaborate calculation, has made it probable, but only as one out of several alternatives, that this week was Tisri 18—25, = September 30—October 6, of the sixth year before the Christian era (Prolegg. p. 85 sq.).

A deaf and dumb person, we thus see, was not precluded from some of the sacerdotal ministrations.

24, 25.] περιέκρυβεν—either, to avoid defilement: see Judges xiii. 13, 14,—to hide her pregnancy from her neighbours till it was certain and apparent,—or, from the precaution which the first months of pregnancy require. Kuinoel suggests, that the reason may have been, that she might devote herself more uninterruptedly to exercises of devotion and thankfulness, and that this is expressed by the words following.

If so, ὅτι must mean ‘because,’ as indeed is the usage of these first chapters,—see below on ver. 45; but it seems here to be only the usual particle by which a speech is introduced: see Gen. xxix. 33. And indeed λέγουσα really carries the reason of her hiding herself—“seeing that she said (within herself). . . .”

ἐπείδεν] There is no ellipsis of ἐμὶ or ἐπ’ ἐμὶ, nor is the meaning, ‘hath looked upon me;’ but ἐπ’ is to be taken with the infinitive following—hath condescended to remove: so ἐφορῶ, Herod. i. 124: cf. ἐπεσείψατο λαβὼν, Acts xv. 14.

Ναζαρέτ] In this particular the information of our Evangelist appears to be fuller than that of Matthew, who seems not to be aware of any residence at Nazareth previous to the birth of our Lord: but see note on Matt. ii. 22.

27.] ἐξ οἴκου Δ. refers to Joseph in this place, who (see Matt. i.) was of the direct lineage of David. That Mary was so, is no where expressed in the Gospels, but seems to be implied in ver. 32, and has been the general belief of Christians. The Son of David was to be the fruit of his body (Ps. cxviii. 11); which He would not be, unless His virgin mother was of the house of David. See notes on the genealogy in ch. iii. [Still we must remember the absolute oneness in the marriage relation, which might occasion that Mary herself should be reckoned as being in very deed that which her husband was. Perhaps this has been hardly enough taken into account. Edn. 5, 1862.]

28.] κεχαριτωμ., not ‘gratia plena,’ as the Vulg.;—for, though χαριτώ is not found in classical writers, the analogy of all verbs in -ω must rule it to mean, the passing of the action implied in the radical substantive on the object of the verb—the ‘conferring of grace or favour, upon.’ And this is its mean-

The figure is perhaps from a bird (as Grotius see ref. Ps.), or from a cloud: see the other reff. ³⁸ [αἱ] Some take this for the predicate of τὸ γενν., 'shall be called holy, the Son of God.' But it is more simple to take it as E. V., that holy thing, &c., making τὸ γενν. ἕγ. the subject, and vl. θ. the predicate. On the latter expression, see note on Matt. iv. 3.

36. συγγενίς] On the συγγενίς in the var. readd., we may remark, that these fem. terminations of common adjectives belong to later Greek. συγγενίς, ἰσχυρώς βάρβαρον, Pollux iii. 50. It is found in Plutarch, Quæst. Rom. (vi. 314), &c. See Lobeck on Phrynichus, p. 452f. Cf. μοιχαλῖς, Matt. xii. 39 reff. What relation, no where appears in Scripture: and traditions are not worth recounting. But we must take the word in the narrower sense, not in the wider reference of Rom. ix. 3. Elizabeth was of the tribe of Levi: but this need not hinder connexion by marriage with other tribes. Aaron himself married into Judah, Exod. vi. 23. We find in Judges xvii. 7 a young man of the family of Judah who was a Levite. Philo de Monarch. ii. 11 (vol. ii. p. 229), says, προσίταξε τῷ μὲν ἀρχιερεῖ μνασθαι μὴ μόνον γυναῖκα παρθένον, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἱέρειαν ἐξ ἱερίων. . . ἐπιεράκη δὲ τοῖς ἄλλοις καὶ μὴ ἱερίων γαμῖν θυγατέρας. 37.] The future, in Hebrew, expresses that which does not belong to any fixed time, but shall ever be so. ῥῆμα] See reff., and above on ver. 4. This place, and its original, Gen. xviii. 14, which are sometimes quoted to shew that ῥῆμα may mean simply "a thing," are in fact most decisive against any such supposition. For the declaration amounts to this, "Hath the Lord spoken and can He not do it?" 38.] Her own faithful and humble assent is here given to the divine announcement which had been made to her. I believe that her conception of the Lord is to be dated from the utterance of these words. So Euthym.: ἀπ' αὐτῆς—ἥδη συλλαβοῦσας ἅμα τῷ λόγῳ αὐτοῦ. Similarly Iren., Tert., Ath., Maldonat., Grot. Lightfoot, holding a different opinion, says, Agnoisco quidem, communiter oblinuisse, quod Virgo in urbe Nazareta conceperit, idque eodem instante quo Angelus eam alloquebatur. She was no unconscious vessel of the divine will, but (see ver. 45) in humility and faith, a fellow-worker with the purpose of the Father; and therefore her own unity with that purpose was required, and is here recorded. 39—56.] VISITATION OF ELIZABETH BY MARY. 39.] The situation of Elizabeth was not before this known to Mary; and on the intelligence of it from the angel, she arose and went to congratulate her kinswoman. But before this the events related in Matt. i. 18—25 had happened. Mary being betrothed to Joseph, had no communications with him, except through the pronuba; who, on the first indications of her pregnancy, represented it to him. This would not take longer time than the expression ἐν ταῖς ἡμ. ταῖς might include—possibly three or four weeks. Then happened Matt. i. 19, 20; and immediately Joseph took her home. As a betrothed virgin she could not travel; but now immediately, and perhaps for the very reason of the circumstances under which Joseph had taken her home, she visits Elizabeth, —remaining with her about three months, ver. 56. So that we have, five months, during which Elizabeth hid herself, + the sixth month, during which takes place the Annunciation, the discovery of Mary's pregnancy, her taking home by Joseph, + three months visit of Mary = nine months, nearly her full time: see ver. 57.

πόλιν Ἰούδα. may possibly mean "the city of Judah," which (Josh. xxi. 16) was given, together with Hebron (in the hill country of Judaea: ib. ver. 11), and other neighbouring cities, to the children of Aaron the priest. But it may also mean 'a city of Judah;' and this is perhaps more likely, as no place of residence is mentioned for Zacharias in ver. 23,—and one would hardly be introduced so abruptly here. See for Ἰούδα thus used, Matt. ii. 6: Josh. xxi. 11. It is not Jerusalem; for that would hardly have been described as in the hill country; and from vv. 23, 65, the Evangelist clearly indicates some other place than Jerusalem as the residence of the parents of John.

41.] The salutation uttered by Elizabeth is clearly implied to have been an inspiration of the Holy Spirit. No intimation had been made to her of the situation of Mary. The movement of the babe in her womb (possibly for the first time: vel nunc primum, vel saltem vehem- mentius, quam pro more, Lightf.) was part of the effect of the same spiritual influence. The known mysterious effects of sympathy in such cases, at least lead us to believe that there may be corresponding effects where the causes are of a kind beyond our common experience.

τ. ἄσπασμ.] Not 'the salutation of Mary (the Annunciation),' but Mary's salutation: the former construction is not according to Luke's usage. 42.] ελλογ.

has a double meaning: that of blessed,—from above—blessed among women, i.e. beyond other women; and praised,—from below—i.e. called blessed by women. The former is the best rendering here: and then εν γ. will be the Hebrew superlative, as in Jer. xix. (xlix.) 15, and Cant. i. 8.

43.] The word κυρίου, as applied to the unborn babe, can no otherwise be explained than as uttered in the spirit of prophecy, and expressing the divine nature of our Lord: see especially Ps. cx. 1, from which Bleek thinks the expression is adopted. 45.] Either (as E. V., Vulg., Erasm., Beza, Meyer) blessed is she that believed, for, &c. or blessed is she that believed that there shall be, &c. The last is maintained by Bengel and De Wette, and supported by Acts xxvii. 26. But I own it seems to me very improbable here; the sense and the period would both suffer;—and the usage of these first chapters is to render a reason by οτι: see vv. 37, 48, 49, 68. De Wette and Bleek urge against it, that we should thus look for σοι and not αὐτῇ. But surely the preceding ἡ πιστεύσασα, rendering the sentence axiomatic, would prepare the way for the demonstrative pronoun of the third person, on either view of ὅτι. I much prefer the former rendering, as agreeable likewise to the analogy of Scripture, where faith, in the recipient of the divine purposes, is so often represented as a co-ordinate cause of the fulfilment of those purposes. Lightf.

 well suggests, that there may have been present to the mind of Elizabeth the unbelief of her husband, as contrasted with Mary's faith. 48—55.] Compare throughout the song of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii.

 1—10. As connected with the defence of the hymns contained in these two chapters, we may observe, taking the very lowest ground, that there is nothing improbable, as matter of fact, in holy persons, full of the thoughts which permeate the O. T. prophecies, breaking out into such songs of praise as these, which are grounded on and almost expressed in the words of Scripture (see Dr. Mill, Historical character of Luke i.

 liever however will take a higher view than this, and attribute to the mother of our

The names of children were given at circumcision, because, at the institution of that rite, the names of Abram and Sarai were changed to Abraham and Sarah,—Gen. xvii. 5, 15. 60.] There is no reason for supposing, with Theophyl., Euthym., Meyer, that Elizabeth had had the name supernaturally intimated to her. She must necessarily have learnt it, in the course of communication by writing, from her husband. 62.] The natural inference (see on ver. 22) from this verse is, that Zacharias was deaf as well as dumb ; nor do I think Kuinoel, De Wette, Meyer, Olshausen, Bengel, Bleek, and Dr. Wordsworth have succeeded in invalidating this inference. There could have been no reason for beckoning, had Zacharias been able to hear articulate words. Bengel's reason, adopted by Dr. W., "commodius est muto innumentes videre quam loquentes audire," is surely too far-fetched.

κέρας—a metaphor from horned beasts, who are weak and defenceless without, but formidable with their horns: see reff.: and cf. Hor. Od. iii. 21. 18, 'addis cornua pauperi.' There does not seem to be any allusion (Selden, &c.) to the horns of the altar—the mere notion of a refuge is never connected with the Messiah's Kingdom.

70.] Meyer cites τοὺς ἀπ' αἰῶνος ῥήτορας, Longin. 34.

72.] ποιῆσαι . . . for a similar use of the infinitive, see ver. 54. We may take it here either as of the purpose, "to perform . . .," which is recommended by the ὅκον δν κ.τ.λ., below,—or with Euthym., Bleek, al., as expecegetic, and equivalent to ἐν τῷ ποιῆσαι, or in English to a participial clause, 'performing,' &c.

73.] ὅκον δν . . . for ὅκου, δν . . . see Gen. xxii. 16—18. Calvin, al., suppose the construction to be κατὰ τὸν ὅκον δν . . .; Grotius makes the words dependent on ἐλάλησεν above, as also the infin. ποιῆσαι: Bleek thinks that the accusative is directly governed by μνησθῆναι, as well as the preceding genitive. "The Holy Spirit, speaking by Zacharias, seems to refer here to the providential dispensation signified in the names of the Baptist and his parents. The Baptist, by his name John, spake of the εἰλεος or grace of God: Zacharias (from ζῶ, recordatus fui, and τζ Jah, Jehovah) signifies θεὸς ἐμνήσθη, and Elisabeth (from ἔλ, El, Deus, and εἰλε, sheba, juravit) is connected with the ὅκος θεοῦ." Wordsw. This seems probable in the case before us: but the student must be reminded that it is ground to be very cautiously trodden, and where a morbid or pedantic fancy will be constantly going astray.

74, 75.] The attempts to remove the Jewish worship by Antiochus Epiphanes and by the Romans, had been most calamitous to the people.

78. ἀνατολή] is (see ref.) the LXX rendering for ἥλιος, a branch or sprout—and thus, 'that which springs up or rises,' as Light:—which, from the clauses following, seems to be the meaning here.

ἐξ ὕψ. may be taken with ἀνατ., as in E. V.:—or perhaps with the verb ἐπιφάναι. But however taken, the expression is not quite easy to understand. The word had come apparently to be a name for the Messiah: thus in ref. Zech., ἰδοὺ ἄνθρωπος, ἀνατολή ὄνομα αὐτῷ: and then figures arising from the meaning of the word itself, became mixed with that which was said of Him. The day-spring does not come ἐξ ὕψους, but from beneath the horizon; but the Messiah does. Again the ἐπιφάναι κ.τ.λ. of the next verse belongs to the day-spring, and only figuratively to the Messiah. See Bleek's long note.

79.] See ref. Care must be taken on the one hand not to degrade the expressions of this song of praise into mere anticipations of temporal prosperity, nor, on the other, to find in it (except in so far as they are involved in the inner and deeper sense of the words, unknown save to the Spirit who prompted them) the minute doctrinal distinctions of the writings of St. Paul. It is the expression of the aspirations and hopes of a pious Jew, waiting for the salvation of the Lord, finding that salvation brought near, and uttering his thankfulness in Old Testament language, with which he was familiar, and at the same time under prophetic influence of the Holy Spirit. That such a song should be inconsistent with dogmatic truth, is impossible: that it should unfold it minutely, is in the highest degree improbable.

80.] A very similar conclusion to those in ch. ii. 40, 52, and denoting probably the termination of that record or document of the birth of the Baptist, which the Evangelist has hitherto been translating, or perhaps transcribing already translated. That this first chapter is such a separate document, appears from its very distinct style. Whether it had been preserved in the holy family, or how otherwise obtained by Luke, no trace now appears. It has a certain relation to, and at the same time is distinguished from, the narration of the next chapter. The Old Testament spirit is stronger here, and the very phraseology more in unison with Hebrew usage.

ταῖς ἐρ.] The δριμύτης of Judaea was very near this wilderness, and from the character of John's official life afterwards, it is probable that in youth he would be given to solitude and abstemiousness. It cannot be supposed that the Essenes, dwelling in those parts, had any, or only the most general kind of influence over him, as their views were wholly different from his.

CHAP. II. 1—20.] BIRTH OF CHRIST. ITS ANNOUNCEMENT, AND CELEBRATION BY THE HOSTS OF HEAVEN. 1, 2.]

We go back again now to the birth of John, or shortly after it. In annotating on these verses, I will first state the difficulty in which they appear to be involved,—then the remarkable way in which a solution has recently been found.

The assertion in these verses is this—that a decree went forth, &c., and that this enrolment first took place when Cyrenius (Quirinus, see below) was governor of Syria. It would then appear, either that this very enrolment took place under Quirinus,—or that the first did so, and this was subsequent to it. Now both of these senses till recently seemed to be inadmissible. For Quirinus was not known to have been governor of Syria till the year 758 U.C., after the banishment of Archelaus, and the addition of his territory to the province of Syria.

τῆς δὲ Ἀρχ. χώρας ὑποτελοῦς προσηνευθείσης τῇ Σύρων, πέμπεται Κυρήνιος ὑπὸ Καίσαρος, ἀνὴρ ὑπατικός, ἀπομισησόμενος τὰ ἐν Συρίᾳ, καὶ τὸν Ἀρχελαίου ἀποδωσόμενος ἔκον. Joseph. Antt. xvii. 13. 5. And the birth of our Lord occurred at least eight years before this, previous to Herod's death, and when Sentius Saturninus was governor of Syria. But in a Commentatio of A. W. Zumpt of Berlin (the nephew of the distinguished grammarian of that name), De Syria Romanorum provincia ab Cesare Augusto ad T. Vespasianum, he makes it highly probable that Quirinus was TWICE governor of Syria. The substance of his researches is as follows:—

In 9 B.C. Sentius Saturninus succeeded M. Titius in the province of Syria, and governed it three years. He was succeeded by T. Quintilius Varus (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 5. 2), who, as it appears, remained governor up to the end of 4 B.C. Thenceforward we lose sight of him till he is appointed to the command in Germany, in which he lost his life in A.D. 7. We also lose sight of the governors of Syria till the appointment of P. Sulpicius Quirinus, in A.D. 6. Now from the maxim acted on by Augustus (Dio Cass. lii. 23), that none should hold an imperial province for less than three or more than five years, Varus cannot have been governor of Syria during the twelve years from B.C. 6 to A.D. 6. Who then were the missing governors? One of them has been found, L. Volusius Saturninus, whose name occurs as “legatus Syriae” on a coin of Antioch, A.D. 4 or 5. But his proconsulate will not fill the whole time, and one or two governors must be supplied between Varus, ending 4 B.C., and Volusius, 4 or 5 A.D. Just in that interval falls the census, of which it is said in the text, that it πρῶτη ἐγένετο ἡγεμονεύοντος τῆς Συρίας Κυρήνιος. Could Quirinus have been governor at any such time? From Jan. to Aug. B.C. 12 he was consul. Soon after that he triumphed over the Homonadenses (“mox expugnatis per Ciliciam Homonadensium castellis insignia triumphi adeptus,” Tac. Ann. iii. 48). Now Zumpt applies the exhaustive process to the provinces which could by any possibility have been under Quirinus at this time, and eliminates from the enquiry Asia,—Pontus and Bithynia,—and Galatia. Cilicia only remains. But at this time, as he shews, that province had been reduced by successive diminutions, had been separated (Dio Cass. liv. 4) from Cyprus, and, as is shewn by the history of the misconduct of Piso soon afterwards, who was charged with having, as ex-governor of Syria, attempted “repetere provinciam armis” (Tac. Ann. iii. 12), because he had attacked Celenderis, a fort in Cilicia (ib. ii. 78—80), attached to the province of Syria. This Zumpt also confirms by the accounts in Tacitus (Ann. vi. 41; xii. 55) of the Clitae, a seditious tribe of Cilicia Aspera, who on two occasions were repressed by troops sent by the governors of Syria. Quirinus then appears to have been governor of Syria at some time during this interval. But at what time? We find him in the East (Tac. Ann. iii. 48), as “datus rector C. Casari Armeniam obtinenti,” and this cannot have been during his well-known governorship of Syria, which began in A.D. 6; for Caius Caesar died in A.D. 4. Zumpt, by arguments too long to be reproduced here, but very striking and satisfactory, fixes the time of his first governorship at from B.C. 4 to B.C. 1, when he was succeeded by M. Lollius. It is true this does not quite remove our difficulty. But it brings it within such narrow limits, that any slight error in calculation, or even the latitude allowed by the words πρώτη ἰγίνετο might well cover it. I may mention it as remarkable, that Justin Martyr three times distinctly asserts that our Lord was born under Quirinus, and appeals to the register then made, as if from it the fact might, if necessary, be confirmed: Apol. i. 34, p. 65; 46, p. 71: Dial. 78, p. 175.

We conclude then, that an ἀπογραφὴ or enrolment of names with a view to ascertain the population of the empire, was commanded and put in force at this time, unaccompanied (probably) by any payment of money. Mr. Greswell (vol. i. p. 511) cites a passage of Suidas—δὲ Αὐγουστος Καίσαρ, δόξαν αὐτῷ, πάντας τοὺς οἰκητορας Ῥωμαίων (?) κατὰ πρόσωπον ἀριθμεῖ, βουλόμενος γνῶναι πόσον ἐστὶ πλῆθος: and has made it probable that, notwithstanding a difficulty in the numbers, this was a census of the empire, and not of the city. We know (see Tacitus, Ann. i. 11; Sueton. Aug. 28, 101; Dio liii. 30; lvi. 33) that Augustus drew up a rationarium or breviarium totius imperii, which took many years to arrange and complete, and of which the enrolment of the inhabitants of the provinces would naturally form a part. Of the data for this compilation, the enrolment in our text might be one.

That Judæa was not a Roman province at this time, is no objection to our text; for the breviarium of Augustus contained the 'regna' of the Roman empire, as well as the 'provincias.' For a statement of the case and its difficulties, as they stood before Zumpt's discovery, see Wieseler, Chronol. Synops. i. 73—122; and a good summary and criticism of the various hypotheses in Winer's Realwörterbuch, edn. 3, art. Quirinus: and a new and curious hypothesis in Dr. Wordsworth, h. l., who inclines to reject the above solution. In Dio Cassius, where we might expect to find information, this portion of the reign of Augustus is apparently defective. [Κυρην.] P. Sulpicius Quirinus (not Quirinius, for Κυρήνιος is the Greek form of Quirinus, Meyer ii. 222; see Sueton. Tib. 49; Tacit. Ann. iii. 48 where however Beck reads Quirinius).

3—5.] There is a mixture here of Roman and Jewish customs, which is not at all improbable, considering the circumstances. In the Roman census, men, women, and children were all obliged to go and be enrolled. Dion. Hal. iv. 15, ἀπαντας ἐκίλευσε (ὁ Τύλλιος) τοὺς ὁμοπάγουσ κατὰ κεφαλὴν ὡρισμένον νόμισμά τι συναρτίζειν, ἕτερον μὲν τι τοὺς ἀνδρας, ἕτερον δὲ τι τὰς γυναῖκας, ἄλλο δὲ τι τοὺς ἀνέθους. But then this census was made at their dwelling-place, not at that of their extraction. The latter practice springs from the Jewish genealogical habits, and its adoption in this case speaks strongly for the accuracy of the chronology. If this enrolment was by order of Augustus, and for the whole empire, it of course would be made so as to include all, after the Roman manner: but inasmuch as it was made under the Jewish king Herod, it was done after the Jewish manner, in taking this account of each at his own place of extraction.

Mary being apparently herself sprung from the lineage of David (see ch. i. 32), might on this account go to Bethlehem, being, as some suppose, an inheritress; but this does not seem to be the Evangelist's meaning, but that, after the Roman manner, she accompanied her husband.

No stress must be laid on ἐμνηστ., as if she were only the betrothed wife of Joseph at this time;—she had been taken to his house before this: the history in our text happening during the time indicated by Matt. i. 25.

7.] Now that πρωτότοκον has disappeared from the text of St. Matthew, it must be here remarked, that although the term may undoubtedly be used of an only child, such use is necessarily always connected with the expectation of others to follow, and can no longer have place when the whole course of events is before the writer and no others have followed. The combination of this consideration with the fact that brethren of our Lord are brought forward in this Gospel in close connexion with His mother, makes it as certain as any implied fact can be, that those brethren were the children of Mary herself.

Ancient tradition states the birthplace of our Lord to have been a cave: thus Justin Martyr, Dial. 78, p. 175, ἐπειδὴ Ἰωσήφ οὐκ εἶχεν ἐν τῇ κώμῃ κεῖνῃ τοῦ καταλῦσαι, ἐν σπηλαίῳ τὴν συνεγγυς τῆς κώμης κατέλυσε· καὶ τότε, ὄντων αὐτῶν ἐκεῖ, ἐτετόκεν ἡ Μαρία τὸν χριστόν, καὶ

ἐν φάτνῃ αὐτὸν ἐτεθείκει. And Origen, against Celsus, i. 51, p. 367: ἀκολουθῶν τῇ ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ περὶ τῆς γενέσεως αὐτοῦ ἱστορίᾳ δεικνύται τὸ ἐν Βηθλεὲμ σπηλαίῳ ἐνθα ἐγεννήθη, καὶ ἡ ἐν τῷ σπηλαίῳ φάτνη ἐνθα ἐσπαργανώθη. Similarly Eusebius, Athanasius, and others. This tradition is nowise inconsistent with our text—for caves are used in most rocky countries as stables. Bleek has noticed that Justin Martyr refers to a prophecy in Isa. xxxiii. 16 (οὗτος οἰκῆσει ἐν ὑψηλῷ σπηλαίῳ πύργος ἰσχυρῆς, LXX), and is disposed to think with Calov, al., that the tradition may have arisen from this. But is not the converse much more likely?

καταλύματι] A public inn, or place of reception for travellers; not 'a room in a private house,' for then the expression would be, 'They found no κατάλυμα.' Of what sort this inn was, does not appear. It probably differs from πανδοχεῖον, ch. x. 34, in not being kept by an host, πανδοχεύς: see note there.

8.] Mr. Greswell has made it highly probable (Diss. x. vol. i.) that our Lord was born on the evening of (i. e. which δραμον) the 5th of April, the 10th of the Jewish Nisan: on which same day of April, and the 14th of Nisan, He suffered thirty-three years after. Before this time there would be abundance of grass in the pastures—the spring rains being over: but much after it, and till after the autumnal equinox again, the pastures would be comparatively bare: see note on John vi. 10.

Δόξα—the brightness of God's presence—the Shechinah (see ref.) which also accompanied His angels when they appeared to men. It is agreeable at least to the analogy of the divine dealings, to suppose with Olshausen, that these shepherds, like Symeon, were waiting for the consolation of Israel. 10, 11.] παντὶ τῷ λ., not (E. V.) to all people, here: but to all the people,—the Jewish people. To them was the first message of joy, before the bursting in of the Gentiles—just as here the one angel gives the prefatory announcement, before the multitude of the heavenly host burst in with their proclamation of 'peace on earth.' σωτήρ]

A Saviour, as E. V.,—the name being particularized afterwards. χρ. κύρ.] This is the only place where these words come together. In ch. xxiii. 2 we have χρ. βασιλεία, and in Acts ii. 36 κύριον καὶ χρ. (In Col. iii. 24 we have, in a somewhat different meaning [said to servants], τῷ κυρίῳ χριστῷ δουλεύετε.) And I see no way of understanding this κύριος, but as corresponding to the Hebrew יְהוָה.

12.] Olshausen hazards a conjecture that the stable or cave may possibly have belonged to these shepherds. But I think the words εἶπεν B., ver. 15, do not look as if Bethlehem were their home. It seems clear that the spot was somehow known to them by the angel's description. βρέφος—not 'the child,'—the angel in giving the sign, generalizes the term—they were to know the truth of his words, by finding a child wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger. 14.] The disputes about this short song of praise are (with one exception, see below) so much solemn trifling. As to whether εἶπεν or εἶπω should be supplied, the same question might be raised of every proclamation which was ever uttered. The sense of both these is included. It is both There is, and Let there be, glory, &c. The song in the rec. is in three clauses, forming a Hebrew parallelism, in which the third clause is subordinate to and an amplification of the second, and so is without a copula to it. εὐδοκία (see ref.) is that good pleasure of God in Christ by which He reconciles the world to Himself in Him (2 Cor. v. 19). And this it is, whether εὐδοκία or εὐδοκίας be read. The interpretation of the latter reading by the vulg. and R.-Cath. interpreters generally, as "bonæ voluntatis," "peace on earth for those that like it," is untenable in Greek as well as in theology. The only passage which seems in any degree to justify it is Phil. i. 15, τινὲς . . . δι' εὐδοκίαν τὸν χριστὸν κηρύσσουσιν, where however we have nothing like the harsh usage which must be assumed here, of the subjective gen. with the absolute sense of the noun. The only admissible rendering is, 'Among men of God's good pleasure,' i. e. among the elect people of God: cf. for the gen. Acts ix. 15: Col. i. 13. And so Bleek renders: "und auf Erden Friede unter den Menschen des Wohlgefallens, nämlich, des göttlichen Wohlgefallens." A curious connexion of εὐδοκίας with εἰρήνη is found in the passage of Origen-lat. by which the gen. is supported:—"Pax enim quam non dat Dominus super terram non est pax bonæ voluntatis." This might perhaps be admissible as matter of mere construction, especially as St. Luke loves to separate genitives from their nouns in construction by an intervening word or words: but it would be difficult to justify it exegetically. As regards the reading, the evidence is materially affected by the fact that B reads εὐδοκίας a prima manu, as I have myself ascertained at Rome: and that κ reads the same. I have therefore now edited the genitive without any marks of doubt. 1862. 15.] If the bracketed words be retained, it will be better to understand them as applying to the shepherds merely, than (with De Wette and Meyer) to suppose οἱ ἀνθ. to be used as distinctive of the shepherds from the angels. Such distinctions are not usual, whereas the redundant ἀνθ. is: see ref. οἱ ποιμένες specifies what οἱ ἀνθ. stated generally: the men, viz. the shepherds. 19.] συνετ. in her memory. ῥήμ. may have its literal sense, words: viz. those spoken by the

 καὶ must not be rendered 'also.' It is simply redundant, as in reff. The Lord was made like unto His brethren (Heb. ii. 17 ; iv. 15) in all weakness and bodily infirmity, from which legal un-cleannesses arose. The body which He took on Him, though not a body of sin, was mortal, subject to the consequence of sin,—in the likeness of sinful flesh : but incorruptible by the indwelling of the Godhead (1 Pet. iii. 18). In the fulfilment therefore of His great work of redemption He became subject to legal rites and purifications—not that they were absolutely necessary for Him, but were included in those things which were πρόποντα for Him in His humiliation and 'making perfect : ' and in His lifting up of that human nature, for which all these things were absolutely necessary (Gen. xvii. 14), into the Godhead.

22—23.] THE PURIFICATION IN THE

TEMPLE. SYMEON AND ANNA RECO-NIZE AND PROPHECY OF HIM. 22.]

See Levit. xii. 1—8, where however the child is not, as here, expressly included in the purification. (It is hardly possible that Joseph had be implied in the αὐτῶν, as Euthym., Meyer, interpret it.) The reading αὐτοῦ is remarkable, and hardly likely to have been a correction. αὐτῆς, adopted by the E. V., is almost without authority (see var. readd.), and is a manifest correction. Bengel denies that either the Lord or His mother wanted purification ;
 and mentions that some render αὐτῶν
 'of the Jews,' but does not approve of it (John ii. 6 is certainly no case in point).
 See the last note, on the necessity of purification for both. 23.] God had taken the tribe of Levi instead of the first-born that openeth the womb, Num. iii.
 12, and required only the excess in number of the first-born over the Levites to be redeemed (ib. vv. 44—51). This arrangement appears afterwards to have been superseded by a general command to redeem all the first-born at five shekels of the sanctuary (Num. xviii. 15, 16).

24.] The offering (ref. Lev.) was, a lamb

But as Bleek remarks, we are not hereby justified in assuming extreme poverty to have been the condition of our Lord's family. This no where appears from the Gospel history. 25.] It appears that this Symeon might have been Symeon the son of Hillel,—and father of Gamaliel, mentioned in Acts v. 34 f. But we have no means of ascertaining this. It is no objection to it that he is here merely ανθρωπος.—Gamaliel himself is only φαρισαϊος τις in Acts v. 34. παρακλ.] See Acts xxviii. 20. It was a common form of adjuration among the Jews, 'Ita videam consolationem, si' &c., referring to Isa. xl. 1. On the general expectation of deliverance at this time, see on Matt. ii. 1 ff. 26.] Of the nature of this intimation, nothing is said. Symeon was the subject of an especial indwelling and leading of the Holy Ghost, analogous to that higher form of the spiritual life expressed in the earliest days by walking with God—and according to which God's saints have often been directed and informed in an extraordinary manner by His Holy Spirit. In the power of this intimation, and in the spirit of prophecy consequent on it, he came into the Temple on this occasion. 28.] καί here again is not also, but simply the introduction to the apodosis. 29.] απολύεις, not του ζην, or εκ της γης,—but as being τον δουλον σου, he thinks of his death as the termination of, and so dismissal from, his servitude. herself was to be included. The sharp pangs of sorrow for sin must pierce her heart also (cf. esp. Acts ii. 37); and the general end follows; that the reasonings out of many hearts may be revealed; that they who receive the Lord Jesus may be manifest, and they who reject Him: see John ix. 39. Similarly Bleek: finding moreover in the traces of her connexion with our Lord in the Evangelic history the piercing and dividing of her soul, and in the last notice of her in Acts i., the triumph of her faith after the Ascension.

37. νηστ. καὶ δεή.] Not merely in the ordinary hours of prayer, at nine, and three, or the ordinary fasts on Monday and Thursday, but in an ascetic-devotional method of life. νύκτα is put first, because fasts were reckoned from one evening to another. Meyer. Is it not rather because the greater solemnity and emphasis rests on the religious exercise by night?

38.] The ἀνθρωμολ. has been understood (by Erasmm., Calv., Calov., al.) to refer to Symeon's also having praised God: but Winer, Meyer, and Bleek more accurately regard the prep. as pointing to the retributive nature of the offering of praise. It was possibly at the hour of prayer; as she spoke of Him to numbers, who would at such a time be flocking to the temple.

39, 40.] RETURN TO NAZARETH.

39.] Certainly the obvious inference from this verse is, that Joseph and Mary returned from Jerusalem to Nazareth direct. But it is only an inference, and not the assertion of the text. This part of the Gospel History is one where the Harmonists, by their arbitrary reconciliations of the two Evangelistic accounts, have given great advantage to the enemies of the faith. As the two accounts now stand, it is wholly impossible to suggest any satisfactory method of uniting them; every one who has attempted it has, in some part or other of his hypothesis, violated probability and common sense. But, on the other hand, it is equally impossible definitely to say that they could not be reconciled by a thorough knowledge of the facts themselves; and such an assertion, whenever made, shews great ignorance of the origin and course of oral narration. How many things will a relator say, being unaware of certain important circumstances outside his narrative, which seem to preclude those circumstances? How often will points of time be apparently brought close together in such a narrative,—between which, events most weighty to the history have occurred? The only inference from these two accounts, which is inevitable, is, that they are wholly independent of one another. If Luke had seen the Gospel of Matthew, or vice versa, then the variations are utterly inexplicable; and the greatest absurdities of all are involved in the writings of those who assume this, and then proceed to harmonize. Of the dwelling at Nazareth before the Nativity, of the circumstances which brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, of the Presentation in the temple, Matthew's account knows nothing; of the visit of the Magi, the murder of the Innocents, the flight to Egypt, Luke's is unaware. In all the main circumstances of the Conception and Nativity they agree, or are easily and naturally reconciled (see further in note on John vii. 42).

40.] ηΰξανε—in body.—ἐκρ., in spirit: πνεύματι is a correct gloss. "The body advances in stature, and the soul in wisdom . . . the divine nature revealed its own wisdom in proportion to the measure of the bodily growth." Cyril. Oxf.

41.] See Exod. xxiii. 14—17. Women, according to the maxims of the school of Hillel, were bound to go up once in the year—to the Passover.

42.] At the age of twelve, a boy was called by the Jews πῦρην π. 'son of the law,' and first incurred legal obligation. At that time, then, commences the second step (see note on ver. 52) of the life of the Lord, the time when the τὰ πρῶτα for Him began; his course of blameless legal obedience (see note on ver. 21) in his own person and by his own will. Now first (ver. 49) appear those higher consciousnesses to have found expression, which unfolded within Him, till the full time of his public ministry arrived. It cannot be inferred from this narrative, that it was the first time the holy Child had accompanied them to the Passover.

answer us,—why should his mother here have spoken and not Joseph, unless there were some more than usual reason for her being put forward rather than his reputed father? Again, let the mythical school of Strauss give us a reason, why an incident altogether (in their view) so derogatory to the character of the subject of it, should have been inserted, if the myths arose out of an exaggerated estimate of the dignity of that character? ^{δ πατ. σου}

Then up to this time Joseph had been so called by the holy Child Himself: but from this time, never. Such words are not chance; had Mary said ἡμεῖς, the strong contrast with what follows could not have been brought out. ^{τί ὅτι ἔ.}]

τί, ὅτι . . . what (reason) is there, that . . . see reff. This is no reproachful question. It is asked in all the simplicity and boldness of holy childhood . . . 'did ye not know?' . . . it appeared as if that conviction, the expression of which now first breaks forth from HIM, must have been a matter known to them before.

δεῖ] This is that δεῖ so often used by our Lord of His appointed and undertaken course. Analogous to this first utterance of His conviction, is the dawn, amongst ourselves, of the principle of duty in the youthful and well-trained spirit about this same age,—this 'earring time' of human progress: see below on ver. 52.

ἐν τοῖς τοῦ π.] primarily, in the house of my Father (so in Sir. xlii. 10, ἐν τοῖς πατρικοῖς αὐτῆς: Theoc. ii. 76, τὰ Λύκωνος: Demosth. p. 1071, τὰ τοῦ ἀποθανόντος: see Lobeck on Phryn. p. 100); but we must not exclude the wider sense, which embraces all places and employments of my Father's (cf. ἐν τοῖς τοῖς ἰσθί, 1 Tim. iv. 15). The best rendering would perhaps be,—among my Father's matters. The employment in which he was found, learning the word of God, would naturally be one of these.

αὐτ. οὐ συν.] Both Joseph and His mother knew in some sense, Who He was: but were not prepared to hear so direct an appeal to God as His Father: understood not the deeper sense of these wonderful words. Still (ver. 51) they appear to have awaked in the mind of His mother a remembrance of ἐληθῆσθαι υἱὸς θεοῦ, ch. i. 35. And probably, as Stier remarks (i. 5), the unfolding of His childhood had been so gradual and natural, that even they had not been forcibly reminded by any strong individual notes, of that which He was, and which now shewed itself.

It is a remarkable instance of the blindness of the rationalistic Commentators to the richness and depth of Scripture narrative, that Meyer holds this οὐ συνῆκαν to be altogether inconceivable as coming after the angelic announcement to Mary. Can he suppose that she συνῆκεν that announcement itself? De Wette has given the right interpretation, 'sie verstanden nicht den tiefen Sinn,' and refers to ch. xviii. 34: so also Olsh., Ebrard. 51.] The high consciousness which had manifested itself in ver. 49 did not interfere with His self-humiliation, nor render Him independent of his parents. This voluntary subjection probably shewed itself in working at his reputed father's trade: see Mark vi. 2 and note. From this time we have no more mention of Joseph : the next we hear is of His mother and brethren (John ii. 12) : whence it is inferred that, between this time and the commencement of our Lord's public life, Joseph died. καὶ ἡ μήτηρ.] These words tend to confirm the common belief that these opening chapters, or at least this narrative, may have been derived from the testimony of the mother of the Lord herself. She kept them, as in wonderful coincidence with the remarkable circumstances of His birth, and its announcement, and His presentation in the temple, and the offerings of the Magi ; but in what way, or by what one great revelation all these things were to be gathered in one, did not yet appear, but was doubtless manifested to her afterwards : see Acts i. 14 ; ii. 1. 52.]

ἡλικ., probably not only 'stature' (as in ch. xix. 3), but age (ref. Matt.), which comprehends the other : so that σοφ. κ. ἡλ. would be wisdom, as well as age.

During these eighteen mysterious years we may, by the light of what is here revealed, view the holy Child advancing onward to that fulness of wisdom and divine approval which was indicated at His Baptism, by ἐν σοὶ εὐδόκησα. We are apt to forget, that it was during this time that much of the great work of the second Adam was done. The growing up through infancy, childhood, youth, manhood, from grace to grace, holiness to holiness, in subjection, self-denial, and love, without one polluting touch of sin,—this it was which, consummated by the three years of active ministry, by the Passion, and by the Cross, constituted "the obedience of one man," by which many were made righteous. We must fully appreciate the words of this verse, in order to think rightly of Christ. He had emptied Himself of His glory : His infancy and childhood were no mere pretence, but the Divine Personality was in Him carried through these states of weakness and inexperience, and gathered round itself the ordinary accessions and experiences of the sons of men. All the time, the consciousness of his mission on earth was ripening ; 'the things heard of the Father' (John xv. 15) were continually imparted to Him ; the Spirit, which was not given by measure to Him, was abiding more and more upon Him ; till the day when He was fully ripe for his official manifestation,—that He might be offered to his own, to receive or reject Him,—and then the Spirit led Him up to commence his conflict with the enemy. As yet, He was in favour with man also : the world had not yet begun to hate Him ; but we cannot tell how soon this feeling towards Him was changed, for He alleges (John vii. 7), "Me the world hateth, because I testify of it that its deeds are evil ;" and we can hardly conceive such testimony, in the years of gathering vigour and zeal, long withheld. The incident of ch. iv. 28, 29 can scarcely have arisen only from the anger of the moment.

CHAP. III. 1—22.] PREACHING AND BAPTISM OF JOHN. DIVINE TESTIMONY TO JESUS AT HIS BAPTISM. Matt. iii. 1—17. Mark i. 4—11. 1.] These dates are consistent with the ἀκριβὲς παρακολουθεῖν which Luke predicates of himself, ch. i. 3. In Matt. iii. 1 we have the same events indicated as to time by only ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις.

The fifteenth year of the sole principate of Tiberius began Aug. 19, U.C. 781, and reckoning backwards thirty years from that time (see ver. 23), we should have the birth of our Lord in U.C. 751 or about then ; for ἐσελ τριάκ. will admit of some latitude. But Herod the Great died in the beginning of the year 750, and our Lord's birth must be fixed some months at least before the death of Herod. If then it be placed in 749, He would have been at least thirty-two at the time of His baptism, seeing that it took place some time after the beginning of John's ministry. This difficulty has led to the supposition that this fifteenth year is not to be dated from the sole but from the associated principate of Tiberius, which commenced most probably at the end of u.c. 764. According to this, the fifteenth of Tiberius will begin at the end of u.c. 779—and our Lord's birth would be u.c. 749 or 50: which will agree with the death of Herod. This latter explanation has usually been adopted. Our present era was fixed by Dionysius Exiguus, in the sixth century, and places the birth of our Lord in 754 u.c. It may be doubted, however, whether in all these reckonings more accuracy has not been sought than the Gospel narrative warrants any expectation of our finding. The ἐπὶ τῷ τρ. is a wide expression and might cover any age from thirty (see note on ver. 23) to thirty-two or thirty-three. See on Matt. ii. 2, where it appears probable from astronomical considerations, that our Lord was born as early as u.c. 747. Mr. Greswell has devoted several Dissertations to this enquiry;—see his vol. i. p. 189 ff. ἡγεμ. Π. Πιλ.] Pilate was only Procurator of Judæa: the words cognate to ἡγεμῶν being used promiscuously of the leading officers of the Roman government. PONTIUS PILATE was the sixth procurator from the deposition of Archelaus, and came to Judæa about u.c. 779. He held the province ten years, and was sent to Rome to answer for his conduct by Vitellius, prefect of Syria, u.c. 789, the year of the death of Tiberius. See chronological table in Prolegg. Vol. II. Ἡρώδου] See note on Matt. xiv. 1. HEROD ANTIPAS became tetrarch of Galilee after the death of his father Herod, u.c. 750, and continued till he was deposed in 792. Φιλίππου] Son of Herod the Great by Cleopatra, a woman of Jerusalem, Joseph. Antt. xvii. 1. 3. He was brought up at Rome, and after his father's death in u.c. 750 was made tetrarch of Batanæa, Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Panias, Auranitis (Batanæa + Auranitis = Ituræa), and continued till his death in u.c. 786 or 787. He built Cæsarea Philippi. He was by far the best of Herod's sons, and ruled his portion mildly and well. He must not be confounded with his half-brother Philip, whose wife Herodias Herod Antipas seduced. This latter was disinherited by his father, and lived in privacy. See note on Matt. xiv. 1. Λυσαν. τ. Ἀβ. τετρ.] ABILENE, the district round Abila, a town eighteen miles north of Damascus, now, according to Pococke, Nebi Abel. It must not be confounded with Abila in Decapolis. Josephus, Antt. xix. 5. 1, mentions it as among the districts which Claudius gave to king Agrippa I. under the name of Ἀβίλα ἡ Λυσανίου, and in B. J. ii. 11. 6, as ἐτέρα βασιλεία ἡ Λυσανίου καλονύμην. In Antt. xx. 7. 1, he has Ἀβίλα. Λυσανία ἐξ αὐτῇ ἡγεμονίᾳ τετραρχία: cf. also Ptolem. v. 15, Ἀβίλα ἐπικληθεῖσα Λυσανίου (making it, however, one of the cities of Decapolis). This Lysanias however was son of Ptolemy, the son of Minnæa (B. J. i. 13. 1), and was killed by Antony, at Cleopatra's instigation (a.c. 34). The Lysanias here mentioned may be some descendant of the other, since we find him here only ruling Abilene, whereas the other is called by Dio (xlix. 32), king of Ituræa. Now at his death we learn that the οἶκος τοῦ Λυσ. was farmed by one Zenodorus (Antt. xv. 10. 1), whom (ib. § 3) Augustus deprived of his ἐπαρχία, and at his death, which immediately followed, gave the principal of his districts, Trachonitis, Auranitis (Antt. xvii. 11. 4), &c., to Herod, a.c. 23. Among these Abilene is not named, and it therefore is possible that it may have been granted to a descendant of the former possessor. The silence of Josephus is no reason against this supposition, as he does not minutely relate the fortunes of districts which do not lie in the path of his history. The appellation of Ἀβίλα ἡ Λυσανίου again in the

It would appear from this verse (and the use of the singular, -ας, renders the inference more stringent. Cf. also St. Luke's own phrase, Acts iv. 6) that Annas, as ex-high-priest, and possibly retaining in the view of the Jews the legitimate high-priesthood, was counted still as having the office: he certainly (John xviii. 13) exercised the power,—and had influence enough to procure the actual high-priesthood for one of his sons, after his own deposition, Jos. Antt. xx. 9. 1. A substitute, or deputy to the high-priest (called by the Talmudists מִשְׁתָּבֵּן הַכֹּהֵן), appears to have been usual,—see 2 Kings xxv. 18; and Annas would thus be able to evade the Roman appointment and keep the authority. ῥῆμ. θ.]

The same rebukes which stung Herod's conscience and aided the desire to imprison John, might work on that conscience, and cause the wish to hear more from the man of God. Vv. 19, 20 are in anticipation of what follows; which is in Luke's manner; see ch. i. 80.

21, 22.] Matt. iii. 13—17. Mark i. 9—11. Luke's account is much more concise than usual, and wholly independent of the others; see note on Mark i. 10: we have here however three additional particulars—1. that all the people had been baptized before the Lord's baptism: 2. that He was praying at the time of the descent of the Spirit: 3. that the Spirit appeared in a bodily form. On (1) we may remark that this is necessarily the meaning of ἐν τῷ βαπ.—for Luke when he means 'during,' &c. invariably uses the present; see for the past tense with ἐν τῷ ref. and ch. xiv. 1; xix. 15; xxiv. 30—for the present, ch. v. 1; viii. 5, &c., and for a comparison of the two, ch. viii. 40 and 42. On (3), see note at Matt. iii. 16, § 2.

23—38.] GENEALOGY OF OUR LORD. Peculiar to Luke. 23.] Jesus was about thirty years old when He began (His ministry); not, 'began to be about,' &c., which is ungrammatical. ἀρχόμενος τῆς εἰς τὸν λαὸν ἀναδείξαι αὐτοῦ, ἦτοι τῆς διδασκαλίας, Euthym., so also Orig., Bengel, Kuin., De Wette, Meyer, Wieseler; see also Acts i. 1. This ὥσπερ τῷ admits of considerable latitude, but only in one direction; viz. over thirty years. He could not well be under, seeing that this was the appointed age for the commencement of public service of God by the Levites; see Num. iv. 3, 23, 43, 47.

If no other proof were in existence of the total independence of the present Gospels of Matthew and Luke, their genealogies

would furnish what I conceive to be an undeniable one. Is it possible that either of these Evangelists could have set down his genealogy with that of the other before him? Would no remark have been made on their many and (on such a supposition) unaccountable variations? It is quite beside the purpose of the present commentary to attempt to reconcile the two. It has never yet been accomplished; and every endeavour to do it has violated either ingenuousness or common sense. I shall, as in similar cases, only indicate the landmarks which may serve to guide us to all that is possible for us to discover concerning them. (1) The two genealogies are both the line of Joseph, and not of Mary. Whether Mary were an heiress or not, Luke's words here preclude the idea of the genealogy being her's; for the descent of the Lord is transferred putatively to Joseph by the ὡς ἐνομμῆτο, before the genealogy begins; and it would be unnatural to suppose that the reckoning, which began with the real mother, would, after such transference, pass back through her to her father again, as it must do, if the genealogy be her's. The attempts of many, and recently of Wieseler, to make it appear that the genealogy is that of Mary, reading υἱὸς (ὡς ἐνομμ. τοῦ Ἰωσήφ) τοῦ Ἠλὶ, 'the son (as supposed of Joseph, but in reality) of Heli, &c.' are, as Meyer (Comm. in loc.) has shewn, quite unsuccessful; see Dr. Mill's vindication of the Genealogies, p. 180 ff. for the history of this opinion. (2) Luke appears to have taken this genealogy entire from some authority before him, in which the expression υἱὸς θεοῦ as applied to Christ, was made good by tracing it up as here, through a regular ascent of progenitors till we come to Adam, who was, but here again inexactly, the son of God. This seems much more probable than that Luke should for his gentile readers have gone up to the origin of the human race instead of to Abraham. I cannot imagine any such purpose definitely present in the mind of the Evangelist.

This view is confirmed by the entirely insulated situation of the genealogy here, between ver. 23 and ch. iv. 1. (3) The points of divergence between the genealogies are,—in Matt. the father of Joseph is Jacob—in Luke, Heli; this gives rise to different lists (except two common names, Zorobabel and Salathiel) up to David, where the accounts coincide again, and remain identical up to Abraham, where Matt. ceases. (4) Here, as elsewhere, I believe that the accounts might be reconciled, or at all events good reason might be assigned for their differing, if we were in possession of data on which to proceed; but here as elsewhere, we are not. For who shall reproduce the endless combinations of elements of confusion, which might creep into a genealogy of this kind? Matthew's, we know, is squared so as to form three tesseradecads, by the omission of several generations; how can we tell that some similar step unknown to us may not have been taken with the one before us? It was common among the Jews for the same man to bear different names; how do we know how often this may occur among the immediate progenitors of Joseph? The levirate marriage (of a brother with a brother's wife to raise up seed, which then might be accounted to either husband) was common; how do we know how often this may have contributed to produce variations in the terms of a genealogy? With all these elements of confusion, it is quite as presumptuous to pronounce the genealogies discrepant, as it is over-curious and uncritical to attempt to reconcile them. It may suffice us that they are inserted in the Gospels as authentic documents, and both of them merely to clear the Davidical descent of the putative father of the Lord. His own real Davidical descent does not depend on either of them, but must be solely derived through his mother. See much interesting investigation of the various solutions and traditions, in Dr. Mill's tract referred to above: and in Lord A. Hervey's work on the Genealogies of our Lord. 27.] τ. Σαλαθ., τ. Lightfoot holds the latter alternative: but I own I think the former more probable. See on the whole question of the appearance of this second Cainam(n) among the ancestors of our Lord, Lord A. Hervey's work above cited, ch. viii., in which, with much research and acuteness, he has endeavoured to shew that the name was probably interpolated here, and got from hence into the LXX. Certainly it appears not to have existed in the earliest copies of that version.

herself was to be included. The sharp pangs of sorrow for sin must pierce her heart also (cf. esp. Acts ii. 37); and the general end follows; that the reasonings out of many hearts may be revealed; that they who receive the Lord Jesus may be manifest, and they who reject Him: see John ix. 39. Similarly Bleek: finding moreover in the traces of her connexion with our Lord in the Evangelic history the piercing and dividing of her soul, and in the last notice of her in Acts i., the triumph of her faith after the Ascension. 37. νηστ. και δεή.] Not merely in the ordinary hours of prayer, at nine, and three, or the ordinary fasts on Monday and Thursday, but in an ascetic-devotional method of life. νύκτα is put first, because fasts were reckoned from one evening to another. Meyer. Is it not rather because the greater solemnity and emphasis rests on the religious exercise by night? 38.] The ἀνθρωπολ. has been understood (by Erasmus, Calv., al.) to refer to Symeon's also having praised God: but Winer, Meyer, and Bleek more accurately regard the prep. as pointing to the retributive nature of the offering of praise. It was possibly at the hour of prayer; as she spoke of Him to numbers, who would at such a time be flocking to the temple.

39.] Certainly the obvious inference from this verse is, that Joseph and Mary returned from Jerusalem to Nazareth direct. But it is only an inference, and not the assertion of the text. This part of the Gospel History is one where the Harmonists, by their arbitrary reconcilements of the two Evangelistic accounts, have given great advantage to the enemies of the faith. As the two accounts now stand, it is wholly impossible to suggest any satisfactory method of uniting them; every one who has attempted it has, in some part or other of his hypothesis, violated probability and common sense. But, on the other hand, it is equally impossible definitely to say that they could not be reconciled by a thorough knowledge of the facts themselves; and such an assertion, whenever made, shews great ignorance of the origin and course of oral narration. How many things will a relator say, being unaware of certain important circumstances outside his narrative, which seem to preclude those circumstances? How often will points of time be apparently brought close together in such a narration,—between which, events most weighty to the history have occurred? The only inference from these two accounts, which is inevitable, is, that they are wholly independent of one another. If Luke had seen the Gospel of Matthew, or vice versa, then the variations are utterly inexplicable; and the greatest absurdities of all are involved in the writings of those who assume this, and then proceed to harmonize. Of the dwelling at Nazareth before the Nativity, of the circumstances which brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, of the Presentation in the temple, Matthew's account knows nothing; of the visit of the Magi, the murder of the Innocents, the flight to Egypt, Luke's is unaware. In all the main circumstances of the Conception and Nativity they agree, or are easily and naturally reconciled (see further in note on John vii. 42).

40.] ἠΰξανε—in body.—ἐκρ., in spirit: πνεύματι is a correct gloss. "The body advances in stature, and the soul in wisdom . . . the divine nature revealed its own wisdom in proportion to the measure of the bodily growth." Cyril. Oxf.

42.] At the age of twelve, a boy was called by the Jews בן חמשה עשר 'son of the law,' and first incurred legal obligation. At that time, then, commences the second step (see note on ver. 52) of the life of the Lord, the time when the τὰ πρόκοντα for Him began; his course of blameless legal obedience (see note on ver. 21) in his own person and by his own will. Now first (ver. 49) appear those higher consciousnesses to have found expression, which unfolded within Him, till the full time of his public ministry arrived. It cannot be inferred from this narrative, that it was the first time the holy Child had accompanied them to the Passover.

It was not till they laid up for the night that they missed him, as at that time (ῥῆτις μηρίαι παιδα) they would naturally expect his return to their own tent. Olshausen remarks, that being accustomed to his thoughtfulness and obedience, they were free from anxiety, till they discovered He really was not in the company. 45. ἀναζητούντες αὐτόν] as they went back, all the way. 46.] Some (Grot., Kuin.) interpret the three days, of their one day's journey out, one back, and one in Jerusalem: but they were more likely three days spent in search in Jerusalem (De Wette); or, at all events, reckoned from their discovery of His not being with them (Meyer). ἐν τῷ ἱερ.] In one of the rooms attached to the temple, where the Rabbis taught their schools. A tradition mentioned by Lightfoot, that till the death of Gamaliel the scholars stood in these schools, appears to be false, as Kuinoel has shewn. No stress must be laid on ἐν μέσῳ; it is only among. Nor must it be supposed from ἐπερωτ. that our Lord was acting the part of a master. It was the custom in the Jewish schools for the scholars to ask questions of their teachers; and a great part of the Rabbinical books consists of the answers of the Rabbis to such questions. 48.—50.] The salient point of this narrative appears to lie in ὁ πατήρ σου contrasted with τοῦ πατρός μου. This was the first time that those wonderful words of self-consciousness had been heard from the holy Child—when He began to be "a son of the law," He first calls HIM His Father, Who gave Him the work to do on earth, of perfectly keeping that Law. Every word of these verses is of the first importance to modern combatants for sound doctrine. Let the adversaries

answer us,—why should his mother here have spoken and not Joseph, unless there were some more than usual reason for her being put forward rather than his reputed father? Again, let the mythical school of Strauss give us a reason, why an incident altogether (in their view) so derogatory to the character of the subject of it, should have been inserted, if the myths arose out of an exaggerated estimate of the dignity of that character? ὁ πατ. σου] Then up to this time Joseph had been so called by the holy Child Himself: but from this time, never. Such words are not chance; had Mary said ἡμεῖς, the strong contrast with what follows could not have been brought out. τί ὅτι ἐξ. ;] τί, ὅτι... what (reason) is there, that... see reff.

This is no reproachful question. It is asked in all the simplicity and boldness of holy childhood... 'did ye not know?'... it appeared as if that conviction, the expression of which now first breaks forth from HIM, must have been a matter known to them before.

δεῖ] This is that δεῖ so often used by our Lord of His appointed and undertaken course. Analogous to this first utterance of His conviction, is the dawn, amongst ourselves, of the principle of duty in the youthful and well-trained spirit about this same age,—this 'caring time' of human progress: see below on ver. 52.

ἐν τοῖς τοῦ π.] primarily, in the house of my Father (so in Sir. xlii. 10, ἐν τοῖς πατρικοῖς αὐτῆς: Theocr. ii. 76, τὰ Ἀβελωνος: Demosth. p. 1071, τὰ τοῦ ἀποθανόντος: see Lobeck on Phryn. p. 100); but we must not exclude the wider sense, which embraces all places and employments of my Father's (cf. ἐν τοῖς ἱσθί, 1 Tim. iv. 15). The best rendering would perhaps be,—among my Father's matters. The employment in which he was found, learning the word of God, would naturally be one of these.

αὐτ. οὐ συν.] Both Joseph and His mother knew in some sense, Who He was: but were not prepared to hear so direct an appeal to God as His Father: understood not the deeper sense of these wonderful words. Still (ver. 51) they appear to have awaked in the mind of His mother a remembrance of κληθήσεται υἱὸς θεοῦ, ch. i. 35. And probably, as Stier remarks (i. 5), the unfolding of His childhood had been so gradual and natural, that even they had not been forcibly reminded by any strong individual notes, of that which He was, and which now shewed itself.

It is a remarkable instance of the blindness of the rationalistic Commentators to the richness and depth of Scripture narrative, that Meyer holds this οὐ συνῆκαν to be altogether inconceivable as coming after the angelic announcement to Mary. Can he suppose that she συνῆκεν that announcement itself? De Wette has given the right interpretation, 'sic verstanden nicht den tiefen Sinn,' and refers to ch. xviii. 34: so also Olsh., Ebrard. 51.] The high consciousness which had manifested itself in ver. 49 did not interfere with His self-humiliation, nor render Him independent of his parents. This voluntary subjection probably shewed itself in working at his reputed father's trade: see Mark vi. 2 and note. From this time we have no more mention of Joseph: the next we hear is of His mother and brethren (John ii. 12): whence it is inferred that, between this time and the commencement of our Lord's public life, Joseph died. καὶ ἡ μήτηρ.] These words tend to confirm the common belief that these opening chapters, or at least this narrative, may have been derived from the testimony of the mother of the Lord herself. She kept them, as in wonderful coincidence with the remarkable circumstances of His birth, and its announcement, and His presentation in the temple, and the offerings of the Magi; but in what way, or by what one great revelation all these things were to be gathered in one, did not yet appear, but was doubtless manifested to her afterwards: see Acts i. 14; ii. 1. 52.]

ἡλικ., probably not only 'stature' (as in ch. xix. 3), but age (ref. Matt.), which comprehends the other: so that σοφ. κ. ἡλ. would be wisdom, as well as age.

During these eighteen mysterious years we may, by the light of what is here revealed, view the holy Child advancing onward to that fulness of wisdom and divine approval which was indicated at His Baptism, by ἐν σοὶ εὐδόκησα. We are apt to forget, that it was during this time that much of the great work of the second Adam was done. The growing up through infancy, childhood, youth, manhood, from grace to grace, holiness to holiness, in subjection, self-denial, and love, without one polluting touch of sin,—this it was which, consummated by the three years of active ministry, by the Passion, and by the Cross, constituted "the obedience of one man," by which many were made righteous. We must fully appreciate the words of this verse, in order to think rightly of Christ. He had emptied Himself of His glory: His infancy and childhood were no mere pretence, but the Divine Personality was in Him carried through these states of weakness and inexperience, and gathered round itself the ordinary accessions and experiences of the sons of men. All the time, the consciousness of his mission on earth was ripening; 'the things heard of the Father' (John xv. 15) were continually imparted to Him; the Spirit, which was not given by measure to Him, was abiding more and more upon Him; till the day when He was fully ripe for his official manifestation,—that He might be offered to his own, to receive or reject Him,—and then the Spirit led Him up to commence his conflict with the enemy. As yet, He was in favour with man also: the world had not yet begun to hate Him; but we cannot tell how soon this feeling towards Him was changed, for He alleges (John vii. 7), "Me the world hateth, because I testify of it that its deeds are evil;" and we can hardly conceive such testimony, in the years of gathering vigour and zeal, long withheld. The incident of ch. iv. 28, 29 can scarcely have arisen only from the anger of the moment.

CHAP. III. 1—22.] PREACHING AND BAPTISM OF JOHN. DIVINE TESTIMONY TO JESUS AT HIS BAPTISM. Matt. iii. 1—17. Mark i. 4—11. 1.] These dates are consistent with the ἀκριβὲς παρακολουθεῖν which Luke predicates of himself, ch. i. 3. In Matt. iii. 1 we have the same events indicated as to time by only ἐν ταῖς ἡμετέροις. The fifteenth year of the sole principate of Tiberius began Aug. 19, U.C. 781, and reckoning backwards thirty years from that time (see ver. 23), we should have the birth of our Lord in U.C. 751 or about then; for ὡς ἐστὶν ἡλικία will admit of some latitude. But Herod the Great died in the beginning of the year 750, and our Lord's birth must be fixed some months at least before the death of Herod. If then it be placed in 749, He would have been at least thirty-two at the time of His baptism, seeing that it took place some time after the beginning of John's ministry. This difficulty has led to the supposition that this fifteenth year is not to be dated from the sole but from the associated principate of Tiberius, which commenced most probably at the end of u.c. 764. According to this, the fifteenth of Tiberius will begin at the end of u.c. 779—and our Lord's birth would be u.c. 749 or 50: which will agree with the death of Herod. This latter explanation has usually been adopted. Our present sera was fixed by Dionysius Exiguus, in the sixth century, and places the birth of our Lord in 754 u.c. It may be doubted, however, whether in all these reckonings more accuracy has not been sought than the Gospel narrative warrants any expectation of our finding. The ὥσθι ἐτὼν τρ. is a wide expression and might cover any age from thirty (see note on ver. 23) to thirty-two or thirty-three. See on Matt. ii. 2, where it appears probable from astronomical considerations, that our Lord was born as early as u.c. 747. Mr. Greswell has devoted several Dissertations to this enquiry;—see his vol. i. p. 189 ff. ἡγεμ. Π. Πιλ.] Pilate was only Procurator of Judæa: the words cognate to ἡγεμών being used promiscuously of the leading officers of the Roman government. PONTIUS PILATE was the sixth procurator from the deposition of Archelaus, and came to Judæa about u.c. 779. He held the province ten years, and was sent to Rome to answer for his conduct by Vitellius, prefect of Syria, u.c. 789, the year of the death of Tiberius. See chronological table in Prolegg. Vol. II. Ἡρώδου] See note on Matt. xiv. 1. HEROD ANTIPAS became tetrarch of Galilee after the death of his father Herod, u.c. 750, and continued till he was deposed in 792. Φιλίππου] Son of Herod the Great by Cleopatra, a woman of Jerusalem, Joseph. Antt. xvii. 1. 3. He was brought up at Rome, and after his father's death in u.c. 750 was made tetrarch of Batanæa, Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Panias, Auranitis (Batanæa + Auranitis = Ituræa), and continued till his death in u.c. 786 or 787. He built Cæsarea Philippi. He was by far the best of Herod's sons, and ruled his portion mildly and well. He must not be confounded with his half-brother Philip, whose wife Herodias Herod Antipas seduced. This latter was disinherited by his father, and lived in privacy. See note on Matt. xiv. 1. Λυσαν. τ. Ἀβ. τετρ.] ABILENE, the district round Abila, a town eighteen miles north of Damascus, now, according to Pococke, Nebi Abel. It must not be confounded with Abila in Decapolis. Josephus, Antt. xix. 5. 1, mentions it as among the districts which Claudius gave to king Agrippa I. under the name of Ἀβίλα ἢ Λυσανίου, and in B. J. ii. 11. 5, as ἐτέρα βασιλεία ἢ Λυσανίου καλουμένη. In Antt. xx. 7. 1, he has Ἀβίλα. Λυσανία ἐξ αὐτῇ λεγόμενι τετραρχία: cf. also Ptolem. v. 15, Ἀβίλα ἐπικληθεῖσα Λυσανίου (making it, however, one of the cities of Decapolis). This Lysanias here however was son of Ptolemy, the son of Minnæa (B. J. i. 13. 1), and was killed by Antony, at Cleopatra's instigation (a.c. 34). The Lysanias here mentioned may be some descendant of the other, since we find him here only ruling Abilene, whereas the other is called by Dio (xlix. 32), king of Ituræa. Now at his death we learn that the ὄλεος τοῦ Λυσ. was farmed by one Zenodorus (Antt. xv. 10. 1), whom (ib. § 3) Augustus deprived of his ἐπαρχία, and at his death, which immediately followed, gave the principal of his districts, Trachonitis, Auranitis (Antt. xvii. 11. 4), &c., to Herod, a.c. 23. Among these Abilene is not named, and it therefore is possible that it may have been granted to a descendant of the former possessor. The silence of Josephus is no reason against this supposition, as he does not minutely relate the fortunes of districts which do not lie in the path of his history. The appellation of Ἀβίλα ἢ Λυσανίου again in the

These accounts however, though perfectly distinct, are by no means inconsistent. The same rebukes which stung Herod's conscience and aided the desire to imprison John, might work on that conscience, and cause the wish to hear

21, 22.] Matt. iii. 13—17. Mark i. 9—11. Luke's account is much more concise than usual, and wholly independent of the others; see note on Mark i. 10: we have here however three additional particulars—1. that all the people had been baptized before the Lord's baptism: 2. that He was praying at the time of the descent of the Spirit: 3. that the Spirit appeared in a bodily form. On (1) we may remark that this is necessarily the meaning of ἐν τῷ βαπ.—for Luke when he means 'during,' &c. invariably uses the present; see for the past tense with ἐν τῷ reff. and ch. xiv. 1; xix. 15; xxiv. 30—for the present, ch. v. 1; viii. 5, &c., and for a comparison of the two, ch. viii. 40 and 42. On (3), see note at Matt. iii. 16, § 2.

23—38.] GENEALOGY OF OUR LORD. Peculiar to Luke. 23.] Jesus was about thirty years old when He began (His ministry); not, 'began to be about,' &c., which is ungrammatical. ἀρχόμενος τῆς εἰς τὸν λαὸν ἀναδείξας αὐτοῦ, ἦτοι τῆς διδασκαλίας, Euthym., so also Orig., Bengel, Kuin., De Wette, Meyer, Wieseler; see also Acts i. 1. This ὡς εἰ tp. admits of considerable latitude, but only in one direction; viz. over thirty years. He could not well be under, seeing that this was the appointed age for the commencement of public service of God by the Levites; see Num. iv. 3, 23, 43, 47.

If no other proof were in existence of the total independence of the present Gospels of Matthew and Luke, their genealogies

would furnish what I conceive to be an undeniable one. Is it possible that either of these Evangelists could have set down his genealogy with that of the other before him? Would no remark have been made on their many and (on such a supposition) unaccountable variations? It is quite beside the purpose of the present commentary to attempt to reconcile the two. It has never yet been accomplished; and every endeavour to do it has violated either ingenuousness or common sense. I shall, as in similar cases, only indicate the landmarks which may serve to guide us to all that is possible for us to discover concerning them. (1) The two genealogies are both the line of Joseph, and not of Mary. Whether Mary were an heiress or not, Luke's words here preclude the idea of the genealogy being her's; for the descent of the Lord is transferred putatively to Joseph by the ὡς ἐνομίζετο, before the genealogy begins; and it would be unnatural to suppose that the reckoning, which began with the real mother, would, after such transference, pass back through her to her father again, as it must do, if the genealogy be her's. The attempts of many, and recently of Wieseler, to make it appear that the genealogy is that of Mary, reading υἱὸς (ὡς ἐνομ. τοῦ Ἰωσήφ) τοῦ Ἠλὶ, 'the son (as supposed of Joseph, but in reality) of Heli, &c.' are, as Meyer (Comm. in loc.) has shewn, quite unsuccessful; see Dr. Mill's vindication of the Genealogies, p. 180 ff. for the history of this opinion. (2) Luke appears to have taken this genealogy entire from some authority before him, in which the expression υἱὸς θεοῦ as applied to Christ, was made good by tracing it up as here, through a regular ascent of progenitors till we come to Adam, who was, but here again inexactly, the son of God. This seems much more probable than that Luke should for his gentile readers have gone up to the origin of the human race instead of to Abraham. I cannot imagine any such purpose definitely present in the mind of the Evangelist.

This view is confirmed by the entirely insulated situation of the genealogy here, between ver. 23 and ch. iv. 1. (3) The points of divergence between the genealogies are,—in Matt. the father of Joseph is Jacob—in Luke, Heli; this gives rise to different lists (except two common names, Zorobabel and Salathiel) up to David, where the accounts coincide again, and remain identical up to Abraham, where Matt. ceases. (4) Here, as elsewhere, I believe that the accounts might be reconciled, or at all events good reason might be assigned for their differing, if we were in possession of data on which to proceed; but here as elsewhere, we are not. For who shall reproduce the endless combinations of elements of confusion, which might creep into a genealogy of this kind? Matthew's, we know, is squared so as to form

three tesseradecads, by the omission of several generations; how can we tell that some similar step unknown to us may not have been taken with the one before us? It was common among the Jews for the same man to bear different names; how do we know how often this may occur among the immediate progenitors of Joseph? The levirate marriage (of a brother with a brother's wife to raise up seed, which then might be accounted to either husband) was common; how do we know how often this may have contributed to produce variations in the terms of a genealogy?

With all these elements of confusion, it is quite as presumptuous to pronounce the genealogies discrepant, as it is over-curious and uncritical to attempt to reconcile them. It may suffice us that they are inserted in the Gospels as authentic documents, and both of them merely to clear the Davidical descent of the putative father of the Lord. His own real Davidical descent does not depend on either of them, but must be solely derived through his mother. See much interesting investigation of the various solutions and traditions, in Dr. Mill's tract referred to above: and in Lord A. Hervey's work on the Genealogies of our Lord. 27.] τ. Σαλαθ., τ. 36. Καϊνάμ.] This name does not exist in our present Hebrew text, but in the LXX, Gen. x. 24; xi. 12, 13, and furnishes a curious instance of one of two things—either (1) the corruption of our present Hebrew text in these chronological passages; or (2) the incorrectness of the LXX, and notwithstanding that, the high reputation which it had obtained in so short a time. Lightfoot holds the latter alternative: but I own I think the former more probable. See on the whole question of the appearance of this second Cainam(n) among the ancestors of our Lord, Lord A. Hervey's work above cited, ch. viii., in which, with much research and acuteness, he has endeavoured to shew that the name was probably interpolated here, and got from hence into the LXX. Certainly it appears not to have existed in the earliest copies of that version.

Ver. 1 is peculiar to Luke, and very important. Our Lord was now full of the Holy Ghost, and in that fulness He is led up to combat with the enemy. He has arrived at the fulness of the stature of perfect man, outwardly and spiritually. And as when His Church was inaugurated by the descent of the Spirit in His fulness, so now, the first and fittest weapon for the combat is "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." The discourse of Peter in Acts ii., like our Lord's replies here, is grounded in the testimony of the Scripture. The accounts of Matt.

and Luke (Mark's is principally a compendium) are distinct; see notes on Matt.
 and Mark.

2.] The literal rendering of the present text will be: Jesus . . .
was led by (in, in the power of, the iv of instrumentality by the conditioning element) the spirit in the wilderness, being tempted (the pres. part. carries a slight ratiocinative force, as usual) during forty days by the devil. So that St. Luke, as also St. Mark, implies that the temptation

οὐκ ἔφ. οὐδ. testifies to the strictness in which the term 'fasted' must be taken.

3.] τῷ λ. τ. pointing to some particular stone—command that it become a loaf.

4.] The citation is given in full by Matt.

5.] There can be little doubt that the order in Matt., in which this temptation is placed last, is to be adhered to in our expositions of the Temptation. No definite notes of succession are given in our text, but they are by Matt.: see notes there. Schleiermacher and Bleek suppose that the inversion has been made as suiting better the requirements of probability: it seeming more natural that our Lord should be first taken to 19. τεθραυματισμένους D¹, τεθραυμένους D².

τεθραυμένος = ἐν τῇ παρδί σου, ver.
 23: see John iv. 44 and note.

κατὰ τὸ εἰωθὸς refers to the whole of what Ho did—it is not merely that He had been in the habit of attending the synagogues, but of teaching in them: see ver. 15. It was apparently the first time He had ever so taught in the synagogue at Nazareth.

ἀνέσ. ἀναγν.] The rising up was probably to shew His wish to explain the Scripture; for so ἀναγimports. Ezra is called an ἀναγνώστης τοῦ θείου νόμου, Joseph. Antt. xi. 5. 1.
 The ordinary way was, for the ruler of the synagogue to call upon persons of any learning or note to read and explain.
 That the demand of the Lord was so readily complied with, is sufficiently accounted for by vv. 14, 15. See ref.

17.] It is doubtful whether the Rabbinical cycle of Sabbath readings, or lessons from the law and prophets, were as yet in use: but some regular plan was adopted; and according to that plan, after the reading of the law, which always preceded, the portion from the prophets came to be read (see Acts xiii. 15), which, for that sabbath, fell in the prophet Isaiah.
 The roll containing that book (probably,

that alone) was given to the Lord. But it does not appear that He read any part of the lesson for the day; but when He had unrolled the scroll, found (the fortuitous,
 i. e. providential, finding is the most likely interpretation, not the searching for and finding) the passage which follows.

No inference can be drawn as to the time of the year from this narrative;
 partly on account of the uncertainty above mentioned, and partly because it is not quite clear whether the roll contained only Isaiah, or other books also. 18—20.]

The quotation agrees mainly with the LXX:—the words ἀποσταῖλαι. τεθρ. ἐν ἀφέσει are inserted from the LXX of Isa. lviii. 6. The meaning of this prophetic citation may be better seen, when we remember that it stands in the middle of the third great division of the book of Isaiah (ch. xlix.—lxvi.), that, viz. which comprises the prophecies of the Person, office, sufferings, triumph, and Church of the Messiah;—and thus by implication announces the fulfilment of all that went before, in Him who then addressed them.

ἀν.] See John ix. 39. The Hebrew words thus rendered by the LXX, ἡρῆτην ὀραῶν, signify, 'to those who are bound, the opening of prison:' so that we have here the LXX and literal rendering both included, and the latter expressed in the LXX words of Isa. lviii. 6.

ἐνιαυτ. κυρ. δεκ.] See Levit. xxv. 8—17, where in ver. 10 we find that liberty was proclaimed to all in the land in the year of jubilee (in the prophecy, κηρύξαι = καλίσαι LXX). No countenance is given by this expression to the extraordinary inference from it of some of the Fathers (Clement of Alex., Origen), that the Lord's public ministry lasted only a year, and something over. Compare John ii. 13; vi. 4; xiii. 1.

²⁰. ἐκάθισεν] It was the custom in the synagogues to stand while reading the law, and sit down to explain it. Our Lord on other occasions taught sitting, e. g. Matt. v. 1; Mark iv. 1; xiii. 3.

The ὑπηρέτης was the ἱγ whose duty it was to keep the sacred books.

^{25.}] Our Lord brings forward instances where the two greatest prophets in Israel were not directed to act in accordance with the proverb, 'Physician heal thyself:' but their miraculous powers exerted on those who were strangers to God's inheritance. εἴτη τρ. κ. μ. 85.] So also in James v. 17;—but in 1 Kings xviii. 1

 we find that it was in the third year that the Lord commanded Elijah to shew himself to Ahab, for He would send rain on the earth. But it does not appear from what time this third year is reckoned,—or at what time of the year, with reference to the usual former and latter rains, the drought caused by Elias's prayer began [it apparently had begun some time before the prophet was sent to be miraculously sustained, as this very fact implies failure of the ordinary means of sustenance]; and thus, without forming any further hypothesis, we have latitude enough given for the three and a half years, which seems to have been the exact time. This period is one often recurring in Jewish record and in prophecy: see Daniel vii. 25; xii. 7: Rev.

 xi. 2, 3; xii. 6, 14; xiii. 5. Lightfoot (ii. 123) produces more instances from the Rabbinical writers. "The period of three years and a half, = 42 months or 1260 days, had an ominous sound in the ears of an Israelite, being the time of this famine, and of the duration of the desolation of the temple under Antiochus." Wordsw.

 have a close parallelism with those of the Syro-Phœnician woman (Mark vii. 26) and ^{28—30.}] The same sort of rage possessed the Jews, Acts xxii. 22, on a similar truth being announced to them.

 This whole occurrence, whenever it happened in our Lord's ministry, was but a foreshadowing of His treatment afterwards from the whole nation of the Jews—a foretaste of εἰς τὰ ἴδια ἔλθην, καὶ οἱ ἴδιοι has been regarded as corresponding with the judicial infiction on these Nazarenes, by means of which our Lord passed out from among them. But see my note, and Ellicott's, on Eph. iv. 18, from which it appears that πύρωσις cannot mean blindness at all. The modern Nazareth is at a distance of about two English miles from what is called the Mount of Precipitation; nor is it built literally on the brow of that mount or hill. But (1) neither does the narrative preclude a considerable distance having been traversed, during which they had our Lord in their custody, and were hurrying with Him to the edge of the ravine; nor (2) is it at all necessary to suppose the city built on the ὄφρυς, but only on the mountain, or range of hills, of which the ὄφρυς forms a part— which it is: see Robinson, iii. 187. Our Lord's passing through the midst of them is evidently miraculous: the circumstances were different from those in John viii. 60, where the expression is ἐκρύβη καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ἐκ τ. ἱεροῦ: see note there. Here, the Nazarenes had Him actually in their custody. ³¹ f.] Mark i. 21, 22. The view maintained with regard to the foregoing occurrence in the preceding notes, of course precludes the notion that it was the reason of our Lord's change of habitation to Capernaum. In fact that change, as remarked on ver. 14, had been made some time before: and it is hardly possible that such an expression as ἦλθ. εἰς τὴν Ν. οὗ ἦν τῆθαμνίμος should be used, if He still resided there. The words πάλιν τῆς Γ. come in unnaturally after the mention of Καφαρν. in ver. 23, and evidently shew that this was originally intended to be the first mention of the place.

What may have been the reason of the change of abode is quite uncertain. It seems to have included the whole family, except the sisters, who may have been married at Nazareth,—see note on John ii. 12, and Matt. iv. 13.

κατήλθ., κατήλθ., || J., because Nazareth lay high, and Capernaum on the sea of Galilee. At end of ver. 32, καὶ οὐχ ὥς οἱ γραμματεῖς (Mark) is here omitted: see Matt. vii. 29.

^{33—37.] HEALING OF A DEMONIAC IN THE SYNAGOGUE AT CAPERNAUM.} Mark i. 23—28, where see notes. The two accounts are very closely cognate—being the same narrative, only slightly deflected; not more, certainly, than might have arisen from oral repetition by two persons, at some interval of time, of what they had received in the same words. ^{33.]}

πν. is the influence, δαίμ. the personality, of the possessing demon. "Both St. Mark and St. Luke, writing for Gentiles, add the epithet ἁκαθαρτὸν τοῦ δαιμόνιον, which St. Matthew, writing to Jews (for whom it was not necessary), never does." Wordsw. The real fact is, that St. Mark uses the word δαιμόνιον thirteen times, and never adds the epithet ἁκαθαρτὸν to it (his word here is πνεῦμα only); St. Luke, eighteen times, and only adds it this once. So much for the accuracy of the data, on which inferences of this kind are founded. The true account of the use of ἁκαθαρτὸν here seems to be, that this evil spirit was of a kind, in

The reading τῆς Ἰουδαίας must, on any intelligible critical principles, be adopted; and Tregelles can hardly be acquitted of inconsistency with his own usual practice, in rejecting it. It is utterly inconceivable that it should have been a correction, seeing that Γαλιλαίας stands firm, with no various reading, in || Mark, from which the rec. reading here has come. (2) That angelist evidently intends this as apostolic calling of Peter and his ms. The expressions in ver. 11 t otherwise have been used. (3) ere is yet the supposition, that ints in Matthew and Mark may . I.

be a shorter way of recounting this by per-sons who were not aware of these circum-stances. But then such a supposition will not consist with that high degree of author-ity in those accounts, which I believe them to have : see note on Mark. (4) It seems to me that the truth of the matter is nearly this :—that this event is distinct from, and happened at a later period than, the call-ing in Matt. and Mark ; but that the four Apostles, when our Lord was at Capernaum, followed their occupation as fisher-men. There is every thing to shew, in our account, that the calling had previously taken place ; and the closing of it by the expression in ver. 11 merely indicates what there can be no difficulty in seeing even without it, that our present account is an imperfect one, written by one who found thus much recorded, and knowing it to be part of the history of the calling of the Apostles, appended to it the fact of their leaving all and following the Lord. As to the repetition of the assurance in ver. 10, I see no more in it than this, which appears also from other passages in the Gospels, that the Apostles, as such, were not called or ordained at any special moment, or by any one word of power alone ; but that in their case as well as ours, there was line upon line, precept upon precept : and that what was said generally to all four on the former occasion, by words only, was repeated to Peter on this, not only in words, but by a miracle. Does his fear, as expressed in ver. 8, besides the reason assigned, indicate some previous slowness, or relaxation of his usually earnest attachment, of which he now becomes deeply ashamed ? (5) It is also to be noticed that there is no chronological index to this narrative connecting it with what precedes or follows. It cannot well (see ver. 8) have taken place after the healing of Peter's wife's mother ; and (ver. 1) must have been after the crowd had now become accustomed to hear the Lord teach. (6) Also, that there is no mention of Andrew here, as in ver. 10 there surely would have been, if he had been present. (7) It will be seen how wholly irrecon-cilable either of the suppositions is with from my ship. The speech is in exact keeping with the quick discernment, and expression of feeling, of Peter's character.

 Similar sayings are found Exod. xx. 18, 19;
 Judg. xiii. 22; 1 Kings xvii. 18; Isa. vi. 5;
 Dan. x. 17. This sense of unworthiness and self-loathing is ever the effect, in the depths of a heart not utterly hardened, of the Divine Power and presence. "Below this, is the utterly profane state, in which there is no contrast, no contradiction felt, between the holy and the unholy, between God and man. Above it, is the state of grace, in which the contradiction is felt,
 the deep gulf perceived, which divides between sinful man and an holy God,—yet it is felt that this gulf is bridged over,— that it is possible for the two to meet,— that in One who is sharer with both, they have already been brought together." Trench on the Miracles, in loc. The same writer remarks of the miracle itself,
 "Christ here appears as the ideal man, the second Adam of the eighth Psalm; 'Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands: Thou hast put all things under His feet . . . the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever walketh through the paths of the seas" (vv. 6, 8)."

 compare, and indeed throughout this miracle, the striking parallel, and yet contrast, in John xxi.—with its injunction, 'feed My lambs,' 'shepherd My sheep,' given to the same Peter; its net which did not burst: and the minute and beautiful appropriateness of each will be seen: this, at, or near, the commencement of the Apostolic course; that, at how different, and how fitting a time! It is perhaps too subtle, and hardly accordant with the rules of emphasis, to find (with Mey. and Stier) a fitness in ζωγρῶν as expressing the ethical catching of men.
 I prefer taking it as the word common to both acts—merely as catch.

then a case follows. For construction, see reff. αὐτόν has apparently been altered to αὐτοῦς from its difficulty. It might indeed be said that -ουκ may have been altered to -ον from the apparent difficulty of all these mentioned needing healing. So uncertain are merely subjective considerations either way: and so necessary is it to adhere in such cases, where any uncertainty exists, simply and faithfully to antiquity, as our best existing guide. 18.] Horne of four, Mark. 19.] This description is that of an eye-witness. For the genitive of place, which is mostly poetical, see Kühner, Gramm. § 523.

καινόν is to be coupled with ιμάντιον, not with πιβλημα. In Mt. and Mk. the mischief done is differently expressed. Our text is very significant, and represents to us the spoiling of both systems by an attempt to engraft the new upon the old—the new loses its completeness; the old, its consistency. 39.] This peculiar and important addition at once stamps our report with the very highest character for accuracy. Its apparent difficulty has perhaps caused its omission from Cod. D and mss. of the old Latin version. It contains the conclusion of the discourse, and the final answer to the question in ver. 33, which is not given in Mt. and Mk. The πιόντες παλαιόν are the Jews, who had long been habituated to the old system;—the νέος is the new wine (see on Mt.) of the grace and freedom of the Gospel: and our Lord asserts that this new wine was not palatable to the Jews, who said ὁ παλαιὸς χρηστός ἐστιν. Observe (against De Wette, &c.) that even with the old reading χρηστότερος there is no objective comparison whatever here between the old and new wine; the whole stress is on θελεῖ and λέγει γάρ, and the import of χρηστότερος is subjective:—in the view of him who utters it. And even if we were to assume such an objective comparison, it makes no difficulty. In time, the new wine will become older;—the man will become habituated to its taste, and the wine itself mellowed: and the comparison between the wines is not then which is the older, but which is intrinsically the better. Stier observes (i. 328), that the saying is a lesson for ardent and enthusiastic converts not to be disappointed, if they cannot at once instil their spirit into others about them. As regards the readings,—the sentence seems to have been tampered with by some who wished to make it more obvious, and to bring out the comparison more strongly: ευθως being inserted, better to correspond with the fact, and the matter in question, and the comparative substituted for the positive: but the sentence loses much of its point and vigour by the change: the old wine is not better than the new (which has not been tasted), but merely good, i.e. good enough: therefore no new is desired.

CHAP. VI. 1—5.] THE DISCIPLES PLUCK EARS OF CORN ON THE SABBATH. Matt. xii. 1—8. Mark ii. 23—28. Between the discourse just related here and in Mark, and this incident, Matthew interposes the raising of Jæir's daughter, the healing of the two blind and one dumb, the mission of the twelve, and the message of John. I need not insist on these obvious proofs of independence in the construction of our Gospels. On the question of the arrangements, see on Matt. 1. Δευτεροπρώτῳ] This word presents much difficulty. None of the interpretations have any certainty, as the word is found nowhere else, and can be only judged of by analogy. (1) It is not altogether clear that the word ought to be here at all:—see var. readd. Schulz supposes it to have arisen from putting together two separate glosses, in the margin of some MSS., one δευτέρω, the other πρώτῳ:—originally inserted,—the first, to distinguish this sabbath from that in ch. iv. 31,—the latter, from that in ver. 6. (2) Chrysostom, Hom. xxxix. on Matt., p. 431, says, ὁ δὲ Λουκᾶς φησὶν Ἐν σαββάτῳ δευτεροπρώτῳ. τί δι' ἵστιν, ἐν δευτεροπρώτῳ; ὅταν διπλῇ ἡ ἀργία ὧ, καὶ τοῦ σαββάτου τοῦ κυρίου, καὶ ἑρίρας ἑορτῆς διὰ διχομίνης. Paulus and Olsh. also take this interpretation. (3) Theophylact understands,—a sabbath, the day before which (παρασκευῇ) had been a Feast-day.

(4) Isidore of Pelusium, Euthymius, and others, think that the first day of unleavened bread is meant, and is called δευτερόπ., because it is δευτέρα τοῦ πάσχα, which had been slain on the evening before. (5) Scaliger and Petavius interpret it to mean the sabbath following the second day of the Passover, from which the seven weeks to Pentecost were reckoned. This has been commonly followed; but is liable to the objection that the assumption, σαββ. δευτερόπ. = σάββ. τῆς ἐξδομάδος δευτεροπρώτου = σάββ. τῆς ἐβδ. πρώτης μετὰ τὴν δευτέραν τῶν ἁλῶμων, is an unjustifiable one. (6) To omit many other conjectures, I may mention that Wieseler (Chron. Synop. der 4 Evv., p. 231 ff.) suggests that it may mean the first sabbath in the second of the cycle of seven years, which completed the sabbatical period. He shews, by a passage from the κήρυγμα Πίρπου (Clem. Alex., Strom. vi. 5, p. 760 P.), that the Jews did call the first sabbath of the year πρώτον—and that the years were reckoned as the first, second, &c., of the septennial cycle (see a decree of Jul. Cæsar in Jos. Antt. xiv. 10. 6). Thus the first sabbath of the first year would be πρωτόπρωτον or πρώτον, that of the second δευτερόπρωτον, &c. And according to his chronology, which fixes this in A.U.C. 782, this year was the second of the sabbatical cycle. If we follow this conjecture, this day was the first sabbath in the month Nisan. The point so much insisted on, that this must have been after the presentation of the first-fruits which took place on the 16th of Nisan,—on account of the prohibition in Levit. xxiii. 14,—is of no weight, as it is very uncertain whether the action mentioned here is included in the prohibition. As regards the analogy of the word, δευτεροδικαίρη, sometimes cited from Jerome on Ezek. xlv. is not to the point: for that word represents the fact that “rursus ex ipsis decimis Levitæ, hoc est inferior ministrorum gradus, decimas dabant sacerdotibus:” so that it was not “the second-tenth,” as Wordsw., but a tenth of a tenth,—a second tithing of a tithe.

casions; Luke omitting it here, because he reports it there—Matthew joining to it the question asked there, because he was not aware of another similar incident.

9.] The words in the rec. text, επ. υμας τι εἰςτιν, admit of two constructions according as they are punctuated: 'I will ask you what is allowable on the sabbath,—to do good, or to do evil?' (επ. υμ. τι εἰς. κ.τ.λ.); or, 'I will ask you a certain thing: Is it,' &c. (επ. υμ. τι: εἰς. κ.τ.λ.) This latter is preferable, both on account of the future εἰςτιν, and of its similarity to ἐρωτήσω υμᾶς κατὰ λόγον, ch. xx. 3. But the reading in the text is much preferable to either. After the question, Mark adds οὐδὲ ἰσωπων—as they did after the question just referred to in ch. xx., because they were in a dilemma, and either answer would have convicted them.

10.] Mark adds μετ' ὀργῆς συλλυπούμενος ἐπὶ τῇ παρώσει τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν—one of the most striking and graphic descriptions in the Gospels. It was thus that He bare (see Matt. viii. 17), even while on earth, our sins and infirmities. Their hearts were hardened,—but He grieved for it.

11.] ἀνοίας. It does not appear that this word can ever mean, as in some former editions, 'madness,' rage of a senseless kind: certainly it does not in refl., nor in Herodot. vi. 69;

Thucyd. iii. 48, there carelessly referred to. The proper meaning, 'senselessness,' 'wicked folly,' must be kept to. See Ellicott's note on 2 Tim. iii. 9, to which I owe this correction. διελάλ.—viz. the Pharisees and Herodians: Mark ver. 6, where see note.

12—19.] CALLING AND NAMES OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. Peculiar (in this form) to Luke: see Mt. xii. 15—21; Mk. iii. 13—19. We may observe that Mt. does not relate the choosing of the Apostles, but only takes occasion to give a list of them on their being sent out, ch. x. 1 ff.; and that Mk. and Lk. agree in the time of their being chosen, placing it immediately after the healing on the sabbath,—but with no very definite note of time.

12.] ἐν τ. ἡμ. τ. is vague in date, and may belong to any part of the period of our Lord's ministry now before us. I believe it to be a form of acknowledgment on the part of the Evangelist, that he did not know exactly into what part of this period to bring the incident so introduced. Indeed the whole of this paragraph is of a supplementary and indefinite character, serving more as a preface to the discourse which follows, than as an integral part of the narration in its present sequence. This of course in no way affects the accuracy of the circumstances therein related, which nearly coincide in this and the cognate, though independent, account of Mark. ἐξελθεῖν.—viz. from Capernaum. τὸ ὄρος.—see on Matt. v. 1.

προσεύξ.—see note on ch. v. 16. κ. ἦν διαν. . . . and spent the night in prayer to God, see E. V. The whole context, and the frequency of the objective genitive (see Winer, § 30. 1, edn. 6), should have prevented the Commentators (Hammond, Olearius, &c.) from making the blunder of imagining προσευχή here to be a proseucha or house of prayer: see note on Acts xvi. 13.

13. προσεφ. τ. μ. αὐτ.] expressed in Mark, προσεκαλεῖται οὓς ἤθελεν αὐτός—i. e. He summoned to Him a certain larger number, out of whom He selected Twelve. We are not to suppose that this selection was now first made out of a miscellaneous number—but now first formally announced; the Apostles, or most of them, had had each their special individual calling to be, in a peculiar manner, followers of the Lord, before this.

ὠνόμασεν] not at a previous, or subsequent period, as Schleiermacher suggests (Trans. p. 89); but at this time. Mark (iii. 14) gives the substance, without the form, of the word ἀπόστολος—ἰποίησεν δώδεκα ἵνα . . . ἀποστόλλῃ αὐτοὺς κηρύσσειν . . . 14.] On the catalogue, see notes on Matt. x. 1 ff.

16.] Ἰούδαν Ἰακώβου—usually, and I believe rightly, rendered Jude the brother of James: see Prolegg. to Jude. On the question who this James was, see on Matt. x. 3, and xiii. 55. 17.] Having descended from the mountain, He stood on a level place—i. e. possibly, as has been suggested by some, on a flat ledge or shelf on the side of the mountain; but more naturally below the mountain: see on Matt. v. 1. Whether Luke could thus have written with the Gospel of Matthew before him, I leave the reader to judge: premising, that is, the identity of the two discourses. 19.] Luke uses the same expression, of power going forth from our Lord, in ch. viii. 46.

20—49.] SERMON ON THE MOUNT (?). Peculiar (in this form) to Luke, answering to Matt. v.—vii. On the whole question of the identity or diversity of the two discourses, see on Matt. v. 1. In Matthew I cannot doubt that we have the whole discourse much as it was spoken; the connexion is intimate throughout; the arrangement wonderfully consistent and admirable. Here, on the other hand, the discourse is only reported in fragments—there is a wide gap between vv. 26 and 27, and many omissions in other parts; besides which, sayings of our Lord, belonging apparently to other occasions, are inserted; see vv. 39, 40, 45. At the same time we must remember, that such gnomic sayings would probably be frequently uttered by Him, and might very likely form part of this discourse originally. His teaching was not studious of novelty like that of men, but speaking with authority, as He did, He would doubtless utter again and again the same weighty sentences when occasion occurred. Hence may have arisen much of the difference of arrangement observable in the reports—

because sayings known to have been uttered together at one time, might be thrown to-

 with some one common link perhaps conτοὺς μ.] The discourse was spoken to the disciples generally,—to the Twelve particularly,—to the people prospectively;

 and its subject, both here and in Matt., is, the state and duties of a disciple of Christ. πτωχοί] To suppose that

Luke's report of this discourse refers only to this world's poverty, &c.—and the blessings to anticipated outward prosperity in the Messiah's Kingdom (De Wette, Meyer), is surely quite a misapprehension.
 Comparing these expressions with other passages in Luke himself, we must have concluded, even without Matthew's report, that they bore a spiritual sense; see ch.
 xvi. 11, where he speaks of 'the true riches,' and ch. xii. 21, where we have εἰς θεὸν πλουτῶν. And who would apply such an interpretation to our ver. 21?

See on each of these beatitudes the corresponding notes in Matt. ἡ βασιλ.
 τ. θ.] = ἡ βασιλ. τ. οὐρανῶν Matt., but it does not thence follow that οὐρανοὶ = θεός, but the two are different ways of designating the same kingdom—the one by its situation—in heaven, where its πολιτεία is (ἡ αὐτῆς Ἱερουσαλὴμ, Gal. iv. 26), the other by Him, whose it is. ²².]

 that taken by Meyer and others, that these 'woes' are inserted from later tradition (gehören zur Formation der spätern Uebersetzung); in other words, were never spoken by our Lord at all:—either we must suppose that they ought to follow Matt. v. 12, which is from the context most improbable,—or that they
 and perhaps the four preceding beatitudes with them, were on some occasion spoken by our Lord in this exact form, and so

²⁶.] Not said to the rich, but to the disciples. The very warning conveyed in ψευδοπροφ. shews this, and should have prevented Meyer from making the blunder. The mention of προφ. and ψευδοπροφ. has reference to the disciples' office as the salt of the earth. The address in ver. 27 is not (Meyer) a turning of the discourse to His own disciples, but ὑμῖν λέγω τοῖς ἀκούουσιν = ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, which introduces the same command Matt. v. 44,— and τοῖς ἀκούουσιν serves the purpose of the ἀκούω—to you who now hear Me. The discourse being mutilated, the strong antithesis could not be brought out.

²⁹.] See Matt. v. 39 ff. ³¹.] Matt. vii. 12; but here it seems somewhat out of connexion, for the sense of vv. 29, 30, has been resist not evil, whereas this precept refers to the duty of man to man, injury being out of the question.

33 ff.] χάρις corresponds to μισθός, Matt. (see note on Matt. v. 12.) 35.

ἀπελπιζόντες] Three renderings have been given—(1) the ordinary one, μηδὲν ἀπ' αὐτῶν ἐλπίζοντες, Euthym.;—but this meaning of the word is unexampled, though agreeing with the context. (2)

'causing no one to despair,' i.e. refusing no one (reading μηδὲν: cf. Ξ in various readings);—so the Syr. renders it. (3) 'not despairing,' i.e. 'without anxiety about the result.' This last sense of the word is best supported by examples, both from Polybius

(e.g. ἀπελπ. τὰ πράγματα, i. 19. 12,— τὴν σωτηρίαν, ii. 54. 7, al. freq., see Index), and the Apocrypha,—see ref. But as it is an ἀπαξ λεγόμενον in the N. T., perhaps the force of the context should prevail, and the ordinary meaning be adopted, as there is nothing in analogy

(ἀπαίτῳ, ἀπολαμβάνω, . . .) to forbid the meaning; and so Passow gives it in Lexic.

υἱοὶ ὑψίστου] Meyer maintains that this must mean 'sons of God' in the sense of partakers of the glory of the Messiah's

Kingdom, but without reference to the state of believers in this life, which last he says is according to the usage of Paul, not of the three first Evangelists. But surely

this is sufficiently answered by ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν in the next verse, where the actual present sonship to our heavenly Father is a reason why we should imitate Him.

36.] οἰκτίρμ. = εἰλεμοί, Matt. v. 48, which last is the larger description, comprehending in it charity and mercy; see note there.

37.] = Matt. vii. 1, 2. The saying is much enriched and expanded here;

perhaps it was so uttered by our Lord on some other occasion; for the connexion is very strict in Matt., and would hardly bear this expansion of what is not in that place the leading idea. ³⁸] The similitude is taken from a very full measure of some dry thing such as corn. That no liquid is intended by ὑπεριεχ., as Bengel supposes, is evident—for the three present participles all apply to the same μέτ. καλ. and form a climax. ³⁹ δώσουσιν] The subject of this verb answers to the unexpressed agents of ἀντιμετρηθήσεται; such agents being indefinite, and the meaning thereby rendered solemn and emphatic; see on ch. xii. 20. If we are to find a nom., it should be the Angels, who are in this matter the ministers of the divine purposes (so Meyer). This saying is found with a totally different import Mark iv. 24; one of the many instances how the Lord turned about, so to speak, the Light of Truth contained in His declarations, so as to shine upon different departments of life and thought. ³⁹.] From this verse to the end is in the closest connexion, and it is impossible that it should consist of sayings thrown together and uttered at different times. The connexion with what went before is not so evident, indeed the ελεγειν δὲ π. αβ. seems to shew a break. The parabolic saying, implying the unfitness of an uncharitable and unjustly condemning leader (the Lord was speaking primarily to His Apostles) to perform his office, leads to the assertion [ver. 40] that no Christian ought to assume in this respect an office of judging which his Master never assumed; but rather will every well-instructed Christian strive to be humble as his Master was. Then follows the reproof of vv. 41—43; and vv. 44, 45 and 46—49 shew us, expanded in different images, what the beam in the eye is, to which our first efforts must be directed.

τυφλ. τ. 38.] See this in quite another connexion, Matt. xv. 14, where Peter answers, φράσον ἡμῖν τὴν παραβολὴν [ταύτην]—meaning apparently the last uttered words, which the Lord however explains not specifically, but by entering into the whole matter. I believe this παραβολή to have been one of the usual and familiar sayings of our Lord. ⁴⁰.] See above. κατηρτισμένος (see reff.)—fully instructed—perfect, in the sense of 'well-conditioned,' knowing what is his duty, and consistently endeavouring to do it. De Wette, Kuinoel, &c., have given a strange rendering of this clause, making κατηρτ.

9.] After this there is an important addition in Matt. on the adoption of the Gentiles, and rejection of Israel who shewed no such faith. 10.] Here Matt. simply states the fact of the healing, not knowing of the οἱ πεμφθ.

11—16.] RAISING OF A DEAD MAN AT NAIN. Peculiar to Luke. 11. ἐν τῇ ἑξῆς.] With regard to the variety of reading here, Schulz remarks that St. Luke, when χρόνῳ is understood, uses ἐν τῷ καθ' ἑξῆς, see ch. viii. 1. On the other hand Meyer observes that when ἡμῖνα is understood, he never prefixes ἐν:—see refl.:—so that internal as well as external evidence is divided. NAIN occurs nowhere else in the Bible. It was a town of Galilee not far from Capernaum, a few miles to the south of Mount Tabor, 'on the northern slope of the rugged and barren ridge of Little Hermon.' Stanley. A poor village has been found in this situation with ruins of old buildings. See Robinson, iii. 226. The κώμη καλουμένη Ναὶν (or Ναϊς) of Josephus, B. J. iv. 9. 4, on the borders of Idumea, is a different place. See Winer, R.W.B.; and Stanley's description, Sinai and Palestine, p. 357, edn. 3.

This is one of the three greatest recorded miracles of our Lord: of which it has been observed, that He raised one (Jaeirus's daughter) when just dead,—one on the way to burial,—and one (Lazarus) who had been buried four days.

12. ἕξεκ.] The Jews ordinarily buried outside the gates of their cities. The kings however of the house of David were buried in the city of David; and it was a denunciation on Jehoiaikim that he should be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn forth and cast beyond the gates of Jerusalem. Jer. xxii. 19. "One entrance alone Nain could have had; that which opens on the rough hill-side in its downward slope to the plain. It must have been in this steep descent," &c. Stanley, ut supra. The usage of μονογενῆς with a dative is classical: cf. Herod. vii. 221, τὸν δὲ παῖδα . . : ἰδὼνα οἱ μουνγενεῖα: Æsch. Agam. 872, μονογενεῖς τίκνον πατρί. κ. αὐτ. χήρ.] Some few cursive mss. read this in the dative, καὶ αὐτῇ χήρῃ: but it is more agreeable to Luke's usage to take it as a nominative. See ch.

14.] The σορός (= λάρναξ, Jos. Antt. xv. 3. 2) was an open coffin. There was something in the manner of our Lord which caused the bearers to stand still. We need not suppose any miraculous influence over them. All three raisings from the dead are wrought with words of power,—‘Damsel, arise,’—‘Young man, arise,’—‘Lazarus, come forth.’ Trench quotes an eloquent passage from Massillon’s sermons (Miracles, p. 241),—‘Elie ressuscite des morts, c’est vrai; mais il est obligé de se coucher plusieurs fois sur le corps de l’enfant qu’il ressuscite: il souffle, il se rétrécit, il s’agit: on voit bien qu’il invoque une puissance étrangère; qu’il rappelle de l’empire de la mort une âme qui n’est pas soumise à sa voix: et qu’il n’est par lui-même le maître de la mort et de la vie. Jésus-Christ ressuscite les morts comme il fait les actions les plus communes: il parle en maître à ceux qui dorment d’un sommeil éternel: et l’on sent bien qu’il est le Dieu des morts comme des vivans,—jamais plus tranquille que lorsqu’il opère les plus grandes choses.’

15. ἔθ. αὐτ. τῇ μ. αὐ.] Doubtless there was a deeper reason than the mere consoling of the widow, (of whom there were many in Israel now as beforetime,) that influenced our Lord to work this miracle: Olshausen (vol. i. p. 271) remarks, “A reference in this miracle to the raised man himself is by no means excluded. Man, as a conscious being, can never be a mere means to an end, which would here be the case, if we suppose the consolation of the mother to have been the only object for which the young man was raised.” He goes on to say that the hidden intent was probably the spiritual awakening of the youth; which would impart a deeper meaning to ἔδωκεν αὐτ. τῇ μ. αὐ. and make her joy to be a true and abiding one.

16.] φόβος, the natural result of witnessing a direct exhibition of divine power: compare ch. v. 8. προφ. μέγ.] For they had only been the greatest of prophets who had before raised the dead,—Elijah and Elisha; and the Prophet who was to come was doubtless in their minds. Bornemann supposes ὅτι in both cases to be not merely ὅτι loquents, but ‘for that,’ and to be connected with ἰδοῦντες (but qu.?).

17.] Meyer refers ὁ λόγος οὗτος to the saying just cited: but it seems more natural to interpret it this account, viz. of the miracle. And so in reff. On the construction ἐξῆλθεν ἐν, Meyer cites Thuc. iv. 42, ἐν Δευκαδίᾳ ἀπήσαν.

 has been imagined that these words are a continuation of our Lord's discourse, (Grot., De Wette, Meyer, Dr. Wordsworth,) but surely they would thus be most unnatural. They are evidently a parenthetical insertion of the Evangelist, expressive not of what had taken place during John's baptism, but of the present effect of our Lord's discourse on the then assembled multitude. Their whole diction and form is historical, not belonging to discourse. Besides, if ακουσας were meant to signify 'when they heard him' (John),

 then βαπτισθ. should be βαπτιζόμενοι.

^{31—35.}] See on Matt. vv. 16—19. ^{36—50.}] ANOINTING OF JESUS' FEET BY A PENITENT WOMAN. Peculiar to Luke. It is hardly possible to imagine that this history can relate to the same incident as that detailed Matt. xxvi. 6; Mark xiv. 3; John xii. 3: although such an opinion has been entertained from the earliest times. Origen on Matt. xxvi. 6 ff. vol. iii. p. 892, mentions and controverts it. It has been held in modern times by Grotius, Schleiermacher, Ewald, and Hug: and recently by Bleek. But the only particular common to the two (unless indeed we account the name of the host to be such, which is hardly worth recounting), is the anointing itself; and even that is not strictly the same. The character of the woman,—the description of the host,—the sayings uttered,—the time,—all are different. And if the probability of this occurring twice is to be questioned, we may fairly say, that an action of this kind, which had been once commended by our Lord, was very likely to have been repeated, and especially at such a time as 'six days before the last Passover,' and by one anointing Him for His burial. I may add, that there is not the least reason for supposing the woman in this incident to have been Mary Magdalene. The introduction of her as a new person so soon after (ch. viii. 2), and what is there stated of her, make the notion exceedingly improbable.

^{36.}] The exact time and place are indeterminate—the occasion of Luke's inserting the history here may have been the φίλος τελωνῶν κ. ἁμαρτωλῶν in ver. 34. Wieseler places it at Nain, which certainly is the last πόλις that has been named: but it is more natural to suppose τῇ πόλει to refer only to τῇ οἰκίᾳ before—the city where the house was. Meyer thinks that the definite article points out Capernaum. The position of the words ἐν τ. πόλει in the amended text requires a different rendering from 'a woman in the city which was a sinner.' We must either render, 'which was a sinner in the city,' i. e. known as such in the place by public repute,—carrying on a sinful occupation in the place,—or (2) regard ἥτ. ἦν ἐν τ. πόλ. as parenthetic, 'a woman which was in the city, a sinner.' The latter seems preferable.

ἦν is not however to be taken as a pluperfect. She was, even up to this time (see ver. 39), a prostitute (compare Augustine, Sermon. xcix. "Accessit ad Dominum immunda, ut rediret munda:" which cannot, as Wordsw., be explained away by what follows, "accessit confessa, ut rediret professa." The latter was a matter of course, otherwise she would not have come at all)—and this was the first manifestation of her penitence. "Quid mirum, tales ad Christum confugisse, cum et ad Johannis baptismum venerint?" Matt. xxi. 32 (Grotius). It is possible, that the woman may have just heard the closing words of the discourse concerning John, Matt. xi. 28—30; but I would not press this, on account of the obvious want of sequence in this part of our Gospel. The behaviour of the woman certainly implies that she had heard our Lord, and been awakened by His teaching.

ΔΛΔΒ. μ.: for the word, &c., see on Matt. xxvi. 7. Our Lord would, after the ordinary custom of persons at table, be reclining on a couch, on the left side, turned towards the table, and His feet would be behind Him. She seems to have embraced His feet (see Matt. xxviii. 9), as it was also the Jews' custom to do by way of honour and affection to their Rabbis (see Wetstein on this passage), and kissed them, and in doing so to have shed abundant tears, which, falling on them, she wiped off with her hair. It does not appear that this latter was an intentional part of her honouring our Lord: had it been, there would hardly have been an article before δάκρυσιν. As it stands, τοῖς δάκρυσιν is the tears, implied in κλαίονσα,—the tears which she shed,—not 'her tears,' which would be δάκρυσιν only. The ointment here has a peculiar interest, as being the offering by a penitent of that which had been an accessory in her unhallowed work of sin.

39. εἰπ. ἐν ἐαυ. λέγων] This phraseology is perhaps a mark of translation from the Hebrew. The Pharisee assumes that our Lord did not know who, or of what sort, this woman was, and thence doubts His being a prophet (see ver. 16);—the possibility of His knowing this and permitting it, never so much as occurs to him. It was the touching by an unclean person, which constituted the defilement. This is all that the Pharisee fixes on: his offence is merely technical and ceremonial.

40.] ἀποκριθεὶς—the disgust manifested in the Pharisee's countenance; for that must have been the ground on which the narrative relates ver. 39. We must not however forget that in similar cases ἰδὼν δ' Ἰησ. τὰς ἐνθυμήσεις αὐτῶν is inserted (Matt. ix. 4), and doubtless might also have been here.

There is an inner personal appeal in the words addressing the Pharisee. The calling by name—the especial ἔχω σοὶ τι εἰπεῖν, refer to the inner thoughts of the heart, and at once bring the answer διδῶς., εἰπέ, so different from οὗτος εἰ ἦν προφήτης.

⁴¹.] We must remember that our Lord is here setting forth the matter primarily with reference to Simon's subjective view of himself, and therefore not strictly as regards the actual comparative sinfulness of these two before God. Though however not to be pressed, the case may have been so : and, I am inclined to think, was so. The clear light of truth in which every word of His was spoken, will hardly allow us to suppose that such an admission would have been made to the Pharisee, if it had not really been so in fact. But see more below.

Δύο χρ.] The debtors are the prominent persons in the parable—the creditor is necessary indeed to it, but is in the background. And this remark is important—for on bearing it carefully in mind the right understanding of the parable depends. The Lord speaks from the position of the debtors, and applies to their case the considerations of ordinary gratitude and justice. And in doing so it is to be noticed, that he makes an assumption for the purpose of the parable :—that sin = the sense of sin, just as a debt is felt to the amount of the debt. The disorganization of our moral nature, the deadly sedative effect of sin in lulling the conscience, which renders the greatest sinner the least ready for penitence, does not here come into consideration ; the examples being two persons, both aware of their debt. This assumption itself is absolutely necessary for the parable : for if forgiveness is to awaken love in proportion to the magnitude of that which is forgiven, sin in such a connexion must be the subjective debt which is felt to exist, not the objective one, the magnitude of which we never can know, but God only : see on ver. 47 below.

πεντακόσια . . . πενήτηκοντα—a very different ratio from the ten thousand talents and the hundred pence in Matt. xviii. 21—35, because there it is intended to shew us how insignificant our sins towards one another are in comparison with the offence of us all before God. ⁴². μὴ ἐχόντων . . . ἔχαρισατο] What depth of meaning there is in these words, if we reflect Who said them, and by what means this forgiveness was to be wrought ! Observe that the μὴ ἐχ. is pregnant with more than at first appears :—how is this incapacity discovered to the creditor in the parable ? how, but by themselves ? Here then is the sense and confession of sin ; not a bare objective fact, followed by a decree of forgiveness : but the incapacity is an aroused one, the forgiveness is a personal one,—ἀμφοτέροις.

τίς οὖν . . .] The difficulty usually found in this question and its answer is not wholly removed by the subjective nature of the parable. For the sense of sin, if wholesome and rational, must bear a proportion, as indeed in this case it did, to the actual sins committed : and then we seem to come to the false conclusion, 'The more sin, the more love : let us then sin, that we may love the more.' And I believe this difficulty is to be removed by more accurately considering what the love is, which is here spoken of. It is an unquestionable fact, that the deepest penitents are, in one kind of love for Him who has forgiven them, the most devoted;—in that, namely, which consists in personal sacrifice, and proofs of earnest attachment to the blessed Saviour and His cause on earth. But it is no less an unquestionable fact, that this love is not the highest form of the spiritual life; that such persons are, by their very course of sin, incapacitated from entering into the length, breadth, and height, and being filled with all the fulness of Christ; that their views are generally narrow, their aims one-sided:—that though ἀγάπη be the greatest of the Christian graces, there are various kinds of it; and though the love of the reclaimed profligate may be and is intense of its kind, (and how touching and beautiful its manifestations are, as here!) yet that kind is not so high nor complete as the sacrifice of the whole life,—the bud, blossom, and fruit,—to His service to whom we were in baptism dedicated. For even on the ground of the parable itself, in that life there is a continually freshened sense of the need, and the assurance, of pardon, ever awaking devoted and earnest love.

In the ὑπολαμβάνω of Simon, we have, understood, “that is, if they feel as they ought.”

44—46.] It would not appear that Simon had been deficient in the ordinary courtesies paid by a host to his guests—for these, though marks of honour sometimes paid, were not (even the washing of the feet, except when coming from a journey) invariably paid to guests:—but that he had taken no particular pains to shew affection or reverence for his Guest. Respecting water for the feet, see Gen. xviii. 4; Judg. xix. 21. Observe the contrasts here:—ὕδωρ,—δάκρυς (‘fudit lacrymas, sanguinem cordis,’ Aug. Sermon. xcix. (xxiii.) 1),—φίλημα οὐκ ἔδωκ. (on the face),—καταφιλοῦσα τοὺς πόδας:—ἐλαίψ τὴν κεφ.,—μύρψ (which was more precious) τοὺς πόδας. ἀφ’ ἧς εἰσῆλθ.] These words will explain one difficulty in the circumstances of the anointing: how such a woman came into the guest-chamber of such a Pharisee. She appears by them to have entered simultaneously with our Lord and His disciples. Nor do vv. 36, 37 at all preclude this idea:—ἐπιγνοῦσα ὅτι κατέκειται may mean, 'having knowledge that He was going to dine,' &c. If she came in His train, the Pharisee would not exclude her, as He was accustomed to gather such to hear Him: it was the touching at which he wondered. 47.] This verse has been found very difficult to fit into the lesson conveyed by the Parable. But I think there need be little difficulty, if we regard it thus. Simon had been offended at the uncleanness of the woman who touched our Lord. He, having given the Pharisee the instruction contained in the parable, and having drawn the contrast between the woman's conduct and his, now assures him, 'Wherefore, seeing this is so, I say unto thee, she is no longer unclean—her many sins are forgiven: for (thou seest that) she loved much: her conduct towards Me shews that love, which is a token that her sins are forgiven.' Thus the ὅτι is not the causative particle, 'because she loved much;' but, as rightly rendered in E. V., for she loved much: 'for she has shewn that love, of which thou mayest conclude, from what thou hast heard, that it is the effect of a sense of forgiveness.' Thus Bengel, 'Remissio peccatorum, Simoni non cogitata, probatur a fructu, ver. 42, qui est evidens et in oculis incurrit, quum illa sit occulta;'—and Calov., 'probabat Christus a posteriori.' But there is a deeper consideration in this solution, which the words of the Lord in ver. 48 bring before us. The sense of forgiveness of sin is not altogether correspondent to the sense of forgiveness of a debt. The latter must be altogether past, and a fact to be looked back on, to awaken gratitude: the former, by no means so. The expectation, the desire, and hope of forgiveness, the πίστις of ver. 50, awoke this love; just as in our Christian life, the love daily awakened by a sense of forgiveness, yet is gathered under and summed up in a general faith and expectation, that 'in that day' all will be found to have been forgiven. The ἀφεις τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, into which we have been baptized, and in which we live, yet waits for that great ἁφένονται σου αἱ ἁμαρτίαι, which He will then pronounce.

The aorist ἠγάπησεν is in apposition with the aorists throughout vv. 44—46, as referring to the same facts.

Remark that the assertion regarding Simon is not αἱ ὀλίγαι ἀφίενται, but ὀλίγον ἀφίεται; stamping the subjective character of the part relating to him:—he felt, or cared about, but little forgiveness, and his little love shewed this to be so: on the whole, see Bleek's note.

49.] This appears to have been said, not in an hostile, but a reverential spirit. Perhaps the καὶ alludes to the miracles wrought in the presence of John's messengers. 50.] See on ver. 47.

The woman's faith embraced as her own, and awoke her deepest love on account of, that forgiveness, which the Lord now first formally pronounced. εἰς εἰρήνην, εἰς εἰρήνην 1 Sam. i. 17; not only 'in peace,' but implying the state of mind to which she might now look forward.

it not in earnest, and bring not forth fruit:—but there is in this very receptivity a wide difference between men; some being false-hearted, hating the truth, deceiving themselves,—others being earnest and simple-minded, willing to be taught, and humble enough to receive with meekness the engrafted word. It is of these that our Lord here speaks; of this kind was Nathanael, the Israelite indeed in whom was no guile, John i. 48: see also John xviii. 37, "Every one that is of the truth, heareth My voice," and Trench on the Parables, in loc.

καλῶς καὶ ἀγαθῶς has here nothing to do with its classical sense of εὐγενής, but is purely ethical,—and to be rendered as in E. V., honest and good. ἐν ὑπομ. in patience—consistently, through the course of a life spent in duties, and amidst discouragements—ὁ ὑπομινος εἰς τίλος, οὗτος σωθήσεται, Matt. xxiv. 13.

¹⁶—¹⁸.] Mark iv. 21—25, where see notes. The sayings occur in several parts of Matt. (v. 15; x. 26; xiii. 12), but in other connexions. Euthym. remarks well, εἰδὸς δὲ κατὰ διαφόρους καιροὺς τὰ τοιαῦτα τὸν χριστὸν εἰπῆν. On the meaning of the separate sayings, see notes on the passages in Matt. Observe that ver. 18, πῶς ἀκούετε = τί ἀκούετε Mark, and δοκεῖ ἔχειν = ἔχει Mark.

¹⁹—²¹.] THE MOTHER AND BRETHREN OF JESUS SEEK TO SEE HIM. Matt. xii. 46—50. Mark iii. 31—35. The incident is introduced here without any precise note of sequence; not so in Matt., who says, after the discourse in ch. xii., ἐν αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος τοῖς ὄχλοις and Mark καὶ ἔρχονται having before stated, ver. 21, that His relations went out to lay hold of Him,—for they said, "He is beside Himself." We must conclude therefore that they have it in the exact place, and that Luke only inserts it among the events of this series of discourses, as indeed it was, but without fixing its place. His account is abridged, and without marks of an eye-

²²—²⁵.] JESUS, CROSSING THE LAKE, STILLS THE STORM. Matt. viii. 18, 23—27. Mark iv. 35—41. The chronology of this occurrence would be wholly uncertain, were it not for the precision of Mark, who has introduced it by ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ὅψις οὐσής,—i. e. on the same day in which the preceding parables were delivered. How it has come to be misplaced in Matthew, must ever be matter of obscurity. The fact that it is so, is no less unquestionable than the proof that it furnishes of the independence of the two other Evangelists.

²³. ἐν μιᾷ τ. ἡμ.] This serves to shew that Luke had no data by which he could fix the following events. If he had seen the Gospel of Mark, could this have been so?

²³.] ἀφύπ. belongs to the later Greek, and even there more commonly signifies 'to awaken.'

κατέβη—from the sky—or perhaps from the mountain valleys around: see Matt. vii. 27, and note on Acts xxvii. 14.

συνῆλ.] They (= their ship) were filling. ²⁴.] See notes on Matt.

²⁵.] In Matt. this reproof comes before the stilling of the storm. But our account, and that in Mark, are here evidently exact.

26.] Αντ. τ. Γ., a more precise description than τὸ πέραν Matt., or τὸ π. τῆς θαλ. Mark.

27.] ἐκ τῆς πόλ. belongs, not to ὑπῆντ. (Meyer and E. V.), but to ἀνὴρ τις—a certain man of the city. The man did not come from the city, but from the tombs.

I put to any reader the question, whether it were possible for either Mark or Luke to have drawn up their account from Matt., or with Matt. before them, seeing that he mentions two possessed throughout? Would no notice be taken of this? Then indeed would the Evangelists be but poor witnesses to the truth, if they could consciously allow such a discrepancy to go forth. Of the discrepancy itself, no solution has been proposed which can satisfy any really critical mind.

That one should have been prominent, and the spokesman is of course possible, but such a hypothesis does not help us one whit. Where two healings take place, narrators do not commonly, being fully aware of this, relate in the singular: and this is the phenomenon to be accounted for. It is at least reasonable to assign accuracy in such a case to the more detailed and chronologically inserted accounts of Mark and Luke.

40—56.] RAISING OF JAEIRUS'S DAUGHTER, AND HEALING OF A WOMAN WITH AN ISSUE OF BLOOD. Matt. ix. 1, 18—26. Mark v. 21—43. Our account is that one of the three which brings out the most important points, and I have therefore selected it for full comment.

40.] ἐν τῷ ὑπ., when Jesus had returned. εἰπ., welcomed Him; see reff. ἦσαν γ.: here we have an eye-witness again.

41.] ἄρχων—a ruler = εἰς τῶν ἀρχισυναγῶγων Mark; —in Matt. only ἄρχων.

42.] μονογ., peculiar to Luke, but perhaps implied in τὸ θυγάτριον of Mark.

ἀπέθν., was dying. In Matt. she is represented as already dead. He is not aware of the subsequent message to Jaieirus, and narrates concisely and generally. The crowd seems to have followed to see what would happen at Jaieirus's house: see ver. 54.

43.] προσαναλ., 'having, besides all her suffering, spent,' &c. But,—see notes on μὴ προσεῶντος τοῦ ἀνέμου, Acts xxvii. 7, and on συμπαρτυεῖν, Rom. ii. 15; viii. 16; ix. 1.—πρὸς may denote the direction or tendency of her spending. Mark adds, that she grew nothing better, but rather worse. The omission of this clause, ιατρ. προσαν. 54. τ. β., in some of the best MSS., is curious. I have not ventured to exclude it, on account of the characteristic ἀπαξ λεγόμενον προσαναλώσασα, which seems to betray St. Luke's hand. The εἰπ. instead of ὑπ., which latter may have come from the ὑπὸ πολλῶν ἰατρῶν of St. Mark, conveys a slightly differing sense. ὑπὸ is more of direct agency, ἀπὸ of ultimate derivation. She could not get more from any system of treatment adopted by any. 44.] Her inner thoughts are given in Mark, ver. 28.

There was doubtless a weakness and error in this woman's view;—she imagined that healing power flowed as it were magically out of the Lord's person; and she touched the fringe of his garment as the most sacred, as well as the most accessible part: see Matt. xxiii. 5: Num. xv. 37—40. But she obtained what she desired. She sought it, though in error, yet in faith. And she obtained it, because this faith was known and recognized by the Lord. It is most true objectively, that there did go forth healing virtue from Him, and from his Apostles (see Mark vi. 56: Luke vi. 19: Acts v. 15; xix. 12), but it is also true that, in ordinary cases, only those were receptive of this whose faith embraced the truth of its existence, and ability to heal them. The error of her view was overborne, and her weakness of apprehension of truth covered, by the strength of her faith. And this is a most encouraging miracle for us to recollect, when we are disposed to think despondingly of the ignorance or superstition of much of the Christian world: that He who accepted this woman for her faith even in error and weakness, may also accept them. 45.] We are not to imagine that our Lord was ignorant of the woman, or any of the circumstances. The question is asked to draw out what followed. See, on the part of Jesus Himself, an undeniable instance of this, in ch. xxiv. 19—and note there. The healing took place by His will, and owing to His recognition of her faith: see similar questions, Gen. iii. 9, and 2 Kings v. 25. ὁ Πέτρ. κ. οἱ σ. αἱ.] A detail contained only here.

On the latter part of this verse many instructive remarks have been made in sermons—see Trench, Mir., p. 192, note (edn. 2)—to the effect that many press round Christ, but few touch Him, only the faithful. Thus Augustine, 'Sic etiam nunc est corpus ejus, id est, Ecclesia ejus. Tangit eam fides paucorum, premit turba multorum' (Serm. lxii. 4). And Chrysostom, ὁ πιστεύων εἰς τὸν σωτῆρα ἀπτεται αὐτοῦ· ὁ δὲ ἀπίστων θλίβει αὐτὸν καὶ λυπεῖ. It is difficult to imagine how the miracle should be, as Dr. Wordsw., "a solemn warning to all who crowd on Christ:" or how such a forbidding to come to Him should be reconciled with δεῦτε πρὸς με πάντες... Rather should we say, seeing it was one of those that thus crowded on Him who obtained grace from Him, that it is a blessed encouragement to us not only to crowd on Him, but even to touch Him: so to crowd on Him as never to be content till we have grasped if it be but His garment for ourselves: not to despise or discourage any of the least of those who "make familiar addresses to Him in (so called) religious hymns," seeing that thus some of them may touch Him to the healing of their souls. I much fear that if my excellent friend had been keeping order among the multitude on the way to the house of Jaecrus, this poor woman would never have been allowed to get near to Jesus. But I hope and trust that he and I shall rejoice together one day in His presence amidst a greater crowd, whom no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues. 47.] It is not necessary (though perhaps probable), from the ἀπ. δὲ πάντων ver. 46, that the woman should also have denied with them. She may have hidden herself among the crowd. Our Lord (Mark ver. 32) looked around to see τὴν τοῦτο ποιήσαν— a wonderful precision of expression, by which His absolute knowledge of the whole matter is set before us.

τρεμ. + εἰδὺν α ὅ γέγονεν αὐτῇ, Mark; which is implied here. All this is omitted in Matt.; and if we had only his account, we should certainly derive the wrong lesson from the miracle; for there we miss altogether the reproof, and the shame to which the woman is put; and the words of our Lord look like an encomium on her act itself. Her confession ἐνώπ. παν. τ. λ., is very striking here, as shewing us that Christ will have Himself openly confessed, and not only secretly sought: that our Christian life is not, as it is sometimes called, merely 'a thing between ourselves and God;' but a good confession, to be witnessed ἐνώπιον παν. τ. λ.

48.] How lovingly does our Lord re-assure the trembling woman; her faith saved her—not merely in the act of touching, but as now completed by the act of confession;—it saved her mediately, as the connecting link between herself and Christ: but the δύναμις ἐξελθλυθῖα ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, working through that faith, saved her energetically, and as the working cause;—τῇ χάριτι, διὰ [τῆς] πίστεως, Eph. ii. 8.

ch. vii. 50 and note. Mark's addition, ἵσθι ὅγ. ἀπὸ τ. μαστίγος σου, is important, as conveying to her an assurance that the effect which she felt in her body should be permanent; that the healing about which she might otherwise almost have doubted, as being surreptitiously obtained, was now openly ratified by the Lord's own word.

49.] Little marks of accuracy come out in each of the two fuller accounts. Here we have ἔρχεται τις, which was doubtless the exact fact:—in Mark ἔρχονται,—generally expressed. In Mark again we learn not only that Jesus heard,—but παρακούσας τὸν λόγον λαλούμενον, i. e. it was not reported to Him, but He overheard it being said, which is a minute detail not given here. Nothing could more satisfactorily mark the independent authority of the two narratives. 50.] καὶ σωθ. is only here.

51.] Our Lord had entered the house, where He found θόρυβον, τοὺς ἀβληγὰς καὶ τὸν ὄχλον (Matt. Mark), who were all following Him into the chamber of death. On this He declared who were to follow Him (οὐκ ἀφήκεν, κ.τ.λ.), and uttered the words ἀναχωρεῖτε· οὐ γὰρ κ.τ.λ.—Then He entered with His three Apostles and the parents. I say this, not for the sake of harmonizing, but to bring out the sequence in our narrative here, which unless we get the right meaning for ἀφήκειν, seems disturbed.

53.] The maiden was actually dead, as plainly appears from the εἰδότες ὅτι ἠπέθ. The words οὐκ ἀπ. ἀλ. κ. are no ground for surmising the contrary : see note on Matt. ver. 24.

54.] Mark gives the actual Aramaic words uttered by the Lord, ταλιθά κύμ.

55.] Her spirit returned : see reff., in the former of which death had not taken place, but in the latter it had ; so that no inference adverse to her actual death can be derived from the use of the word.

The command to give her to eat, shews that she was restored to actual life with its wants and weaknesses ; and in that incipient state of convalescence, which would require nourishment. The testimony of Mark here precludes all idea of a recovery from a mere paroxysm—καὶ περι-επάει. One who ἰσχάτως εἶχεν at the time of the father's coming, and then died, so that it could be said of the minstrels and others who had time to assemble, εἰδότες ὅτι ἀπέθανεν,—could not, supposing that they were mistaken and she was only in a trance, have risen up and walked, and been in a situation to take meat, in so short a time after. Every part of the narrative combines to declare that the death was real, and the miracle a raising from the dead, in the strictest sense.

56.] The injunction, however, was not observed ; for we read in Matt., ἐξῆλθεν ἡ φῆμη αὐτῇ εἰς ὅλην τὴν γῆν ἑκείνην. CHAP. IX. 1—5.] MISSION OF THE TWELVE. Matt. x. 5—15. Mark vi. 7—13.  works were done in their Master's Name, and in popular rumour passed for His.

9.] The repetition of ἐγὼ implies personal concern and alarm at the growing fame of Jesus: see notes on Matt.

10—17.] RETURN OF THE APOSTLES. JESUS RETIRES TO BETHSAIDA. FEEDING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND. Matt. xiv. 13—21. Mark vi. 30—44. John vi. 1—13. Compare the notes on each of these.

10.] He went in a ship (Matt., Mark, John), of which our Evangelist seems not to have been aware; for we should gather from our text that it was by land. A great difficulty also attends the mention of Bethsaida here. At first sight, it would appear to be the well-known Bethsaida, on the western bank of the lake, not far from Capernaum. But (1) our Lord was on this side before,—see ch. viii. 37; and (2) Mark (vi. 45) relates that after the miracle of the loaves He caused His disciples to cross over to Bethsaida. But there were two places of this name:—another Bethsaida (Julias) lay at the top of the lake, on the Jordan: see

Stanley, p. 381, edn. 3: Van de Velde, index, sub voce. Now it is very likely that our Lord may have crossed the lake to this Bethsaida, and St. Luke, finding that the miracle happened near Bethsaida, and not being aware of the crossing of the lake, may have left the name thus without explanation, as being that of the other Bethsaida. Mark gives us the exact account: that the Lord and the disciples, who went by sea, were perceived by the multitude who went by land, and arrived before Him. How any of these accounts could have been compiled with a knowledge of the others, I cannot imagine.

11.] See note on Mark ver. 34. [ἀπο]δεξάμ. This word includes what Mark tells us of His going forth from His solitude, or perhaps landing from the ship, and seeing a great multitude, and having compassion on them; having received them, i. e. not sent them away.

12.] As the Three agree in their account, and John differs from them, see the difference discussed in notes there. In expressed as in Matt.

Immediately after this miracle, Matt., Mark, and John relate the walking on the sea, which, and the whole series of events following as far as Matt. xvi. 12,—the healings in the land of Gennesaret, the discourse about un-washen hands, the Syrophenician woman, the healing of multitudes by the sea of Galilee, the feeding of the 4000, the asking of a sign from Heaven, and the forgetting to take bread, are wholly omitted by our Evangelist. Supposing him to have had Matt. before him, how is this to be explained? It is also an important observation, that the omission by Luke of the second miracle of feeding is not to be adduced against its historical reality, as Schleiermacher has done (transl. p. 144), since it is only omitted as occurring in the midst of a large section, which the accounts gathered by Luke did not contain. We see also, that the characteristic κοφίνους of Lord's command to them: the command itself is related in Matt. ver. 9, and Mark ver. 9.

37—42.] HEALING OF A POSSESSED PERSON. Matt. xvii. 14—21. Mark ix. 14—29. The narrative in Mark is by far the most copious, and I have commented at length on it. 37. τ. εξ. ἡμ.] The transfiguration probably took place at night,—see on Matt. xvii. 1,—and this was in the morning. Luke omits the whole discourse concerning Elias (Matt. and Mark, vv. 9—13).

38.] μὲν μοι ἔστιν is peculiar to Luke. 39.] κράζει —i.e. the child—there is a rapid change of subject, see ch. xvii. 2; xix. 4 al. and Winer, § 67. 1, edn. 6. συντρίβον is perhaps literal—bruising him.

43—45.] OUR LORD'S SECOND ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS DEATH. Matt. xvii.

dence is to be thought of among those sent in His name; for that even a little child, if thus sent, is clothed with His dignity; and if there be any distinction among such, it is this, that he who is like that child, humblest and least, i. e. nearest to the spirit of his Lord, he is the greatest.

"The whole discourse in Luke is without connexion." De Wette, strangely enough: who also says, κ. 8. ἰδὲν ἡμῖν διέξ. . . . is borrowed from Matt. x. 40; and that ὁ γὰρ μικρ. . . . οὗτος ἔσται . . . ought to stand at the beginning of the discourse, as in Matt. I quote this as one among continually recurring specimens of the criticism which would cut our precious, and most truthful Gospels into fragments without meaning or connexion. We live in times when such criticisms are making way among shallow minds: let the student judge from the above sample, what they are generally worth. Schleiermacher has some excellent remarks on this discourse and the circumstances, Essay on Luke, translation, pp. 159—162.

49, 50.] On the connexion of this answer with the preceding, see on Mark. It is even more strikingly brought out here. Our Lord had declared the absolute equality of all sent in His name—and that if there were any difference, it was to be made by a deeper self-renouncing. Then arises the thought in the mind of the ardent son of Zebedee, of the exclusive and peculiar dignity of those who were thus sent, the ἀπόστολοι: and he relates what they had done, as a proof of his fully appreciating this exclusive dignity. The link to what has preceded, is in the words ἐπὶ τῷ ὀν. σου . . . see the rest in Mark.

51—CHAP. XIX. 28.] INCIDENTS DURING THE LORD'S LAST JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM. We now enter upon a long and most important portion of our Gospel, peculiar in this form, and most of it entirely peculiar, to Luke. At ch. xviii. 15 he again joins the narrative of Matt. and Mark within a few verses of where he parted from them. Respecting this portion, I will observe, without entangling myself in the harmonistic maze into which most of the interpreters have ventured, (1) that the whole of it is to be understood here as belonging to our Lord's last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem; see below on ver. 51. (2) that evidently that journey was not a direct one (see ch. x. 1; xiii. 22, 31; xvii. 11; xviii. 31, and notes), either in time or in the road chosen. (3) that in each of the two other Gospels there is a journey placed at this very time, described Matt. xix. 1, μετῆρξεν ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας καὶ ἦλθεν εἰς τὰ ὅρια τῆς ἰουδαίας πέραν τοῦ ἰορδάνου, and Mark x. 1, ἐκείθεν ἀναστὰς ἔρχεται εἰς τὰ ὅρια τῆς ἰουδ. καὶ πέραν τοῦ ἰορδάνου,—which, in their narrative also, is the last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem. (4) that in John x. 22, we find our Lord at Jerusalem, at the feast of dedication, in the winter (about the end of December), without however any hint as to how or whence He came there. (5) that the whole time between that feast and His Passion is spent thus:—After the attempt to stone Him, John x. 31, He retired to Bethany beyond Jordan;—was summoned thence by the message from Martha and Mary to Bethany near Jerusalem, where He raised Lazarus;—again retired to Ephraim, somewhere beyond Jericho, on the borders of the desert;—six days before the passover came to Bethany, and the anointing took place, &c.; this whole time being three months and a few days. (6) I believe then that we have obtained a fixed critical point in all the four Gospels for the last journey from Galilee, after which He never returned (in the flesh) thither again. And this last journey was to the feast of dedication, or at all events brought Him in time for that feast (for it does not look like a journey specially to a feast) at Jerusalem. It was between the feast of tabernacles in John vii. 2, to which He went up privately (ib. ver. 10), and the occasion when we find Him in Solomon's porch, John x. 22. (7) The three first evangelists relate nothing of the being in Jerusalem at the feast of dedication, or indeed at all, except at the last passover. We therefore find in them nothing of the retirements to Bethany (beyond Jordan) and Ephraim; but the removal of our Lord from Galilee to the confines of Judæa through the parts beyond Jordan is described as uninterrupted. (8) We are now I believe in a situation to appreciate the view with which our Evangelist inserts this portion. He takes this journey, beginning its narrative at the very same place where the others do, as comprehending—as indeed in strict historical fact it did—the last solemn farewell to Galilee (ch. x. 13—15), the final resolve of our Lord to go up to Jerusalem (ix. 51), and,—which in its wider sense it did,—all the records which he possessed of miracles and discourses between this time and the triumphal entry. (9) As to arranging or harmonizing the separate incidents contained in this portion, as the Evangelist himself has completely by his connecting words in many places disclaimed it (see ch. ix. 57; x. 1, 25, 38; xi. 1, 14; xii. 1, xiii. 1, 10, 22; xiv. 1, 25; xv. 1; xvii. 1, 5, 11, 20; xviii. 1, 9),—I do not suppose that we, at this distance of time, shall succeed in doing so. The separate difficulties will be treated of as they occur.

51.] συμπλ. not past—not, when the days were fulfilled; but, were being fulfilled: i. e. approaching their fulfilment. 'When the time was come,' E. V. is too strong: when the days were come would be better, for that would include the whole of the journey in those days. See ref.

ἀνάλημψις can have but one meaning (which, as the word itself is not found elsewhere, must be determined by the sense of the cognate verb: see ref.), His assumption, i. e. ascension into heaven. ἡμέρας τῆς ἀναλήψεως αὐτοῦ λίγει τὸν καιρὸν τὸν ἀφορεθίντα μέχρι τῆς ἀναλήψεως αὐτοῦ τῆς ἀπὸ γῆς οὐρανόν, Euthym.

αὐτὸς resumes the subject, not without some emphasis implying his own voluntary action.

τὸ πρὸς. αἶ. ἑστ. a Hebraism, see ref., implying determinate fixed purpose; cf. Isa. l. 7, the sense of which, as prophetic of the Messiah going to his sufferings, seems to be referred to in this expression. The LXX have there, ἔθηκε τὸ πρόσωπόν μου ὡς σιδηρὴν πύργον.

see note, John iv. 9. The publicity now courted by our Lord is in remarkable contrast to His former avoidance of notice, and is a feature of the close of His ministry, giving rise to the accusation of ch. xiii. 5. ἔτι ἐτ. αὐτῷ must mean something more, surely, than to provide board and lodging; there is a solemnity about the sentence which forbids that supposition. It must have been to announce the coming of Jesus as the Messiah, which He did not conceal in Samaria, as in Judæa and Galilee, see John iv. 26; and the refusal of the Samaritans must have been grounded on the jealousy excited by the preference shewn for the Jewish rites and metropolis.

They expected that the Messiah would have confirmed their anti-Jewish rites and Gerizim temple, instead of going up solemnly to Jerusalem, and thereby condemning them. 54.] The disciples whom He named 'sons of thunder,' Mark iii. 17. They saw some insult of manner, or actual refusal to allow the Lord to enter their village. That a collision of this kind did take place is plain from the last verse, and implied from the occasion alluded to by the two Apostles, where the fire was invoked in the presence of the offending persons. It happened also in Samaria. πῦρ, not lightning, but fire, as in the passage alluded to, and in 1 Kings xviii. 38. It is exceedingly difficult to determine the true reading in this passage, which seems to have been more than usually tampered with, or wrongly written. It is hardly conceivable that the shorter text, as edited by Tischdf., . . . ἀναλῶσαι αὐτούς; στραφεῖς δὲ ἐπετίμησεν αὐτοῖς. καὶ ἐπορεύθησαν . . . should have been the original, and all the rest, insertion. Homocoteleuton may have had some share in the omission of the latter debated portion, from ΚΑΙ ΕΙΠΕΙΝ ΤΟ ΚΑΙ ΕΙΠΕΙΝ: but this does not touch ὥς καὶ Ἡλ. ἐπ. It has been suggested that those words may have been removed as involving indirect censure of Elias: but surely this lay too far off to create any offence. And their insertion into the text is quite inexplicable. In this great uncertainty, I have thought the candid way is to let my edited text reflect such uncertainty, and I have therefore printed these latter debatable words in the same type as the text, and have annotated on them. Let it be remembered that in both cases, versions far more ancient than our oldest MSS. contain these words. 55.] [οὐκ οἴδατε οἶον πνεύματος ἐστε. Besides the mistaken ways of explaining these words of our Lord (e. g. 'Do you not see what a [bad] spirit you are shewing?' Bornemann) there are two senses which it may bear. sed οὐ κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν, et qui proinde humani est affectus, non divinæ motionis.' Grot.; or (2) interrogative—'Know ye not what manner of spirit ye belong to (are of)?' the spirit meant being the Holy Spirit. 'The Spirit in Elias was a fiery and judicial spirit, as befitted the times and the character of God's dealings then; but the Spirit in Me and mine is of a different kind—a spirit of love and forgiveness.'

The latter of these is perhaps better suited to the context: but we seem to want an example in the gospels of (ὁς) οἶδατε used interrogatively: see Matt. vii. 11 ||; xx. 22, 25 ||; xxiv. 42 ||; xxv. 13; xxvi. 2; Mark iv. 13 (doubtful, but the construction is direct), ch. xii. 56; John viii. 14; xiv. 4 al. I have therefore punctuated according to the former sense: which, indeed, seems more naturally followed by the γάρ of the clause following. It is very interesting to remember that this same John came down to Samaria (Acts viii. 14—17) with Peter, to confer the gift of the Holy Spirit on the Samaritan believers.]

57—62.] Matthew (viii. 19—22) relates the contents of vv. 57—60, but at a totally different period of our Lord's ministry, viz.

His crossing the lake to go to Gadara. It is quite impossible to decide which Evangelist has placed the incidents in their proper chronological place. When we once begin to speculate on such things, it is easy to find a fitness, on whichever side of the argument we range ourselves. Only (see notes on Matt.) we must not adopt the wretched subterfuge of the harmonists, and maintain that the two events took place twice, each time consecutively, and each time with the same reply from our Lord.

57, 58.] See notes on Matt. 59. ἀκολουθεῖ μοι.] This command is implied in Matthew, where the reply is, as here, κύριε, ἐπίτρεψόν μοι πρῶτον . . . which words could hardly be spoken without a reference in the πρῶτον to it.

things, as some have rendered it. The answer of our Lord again seems to refer to the sending out into the harvest (ch. x. 2), for which the present seventy were as it were the ploughmen, first breaking up the ground. The saying itself is to be explained simply from agricultural operations—for he who has his hand on the plough, guiding it, must look on the furrow which his share is making—if he look behind, his work will be marred. Hesiod's precept is very similar, ἔργ. ii. 60, ἰθὺν οὐλας ἱλαῦνοι, μηκέτι παπταίνων μεθ' ἀμύλικας ἀλλ' ἐπὶ ἔργῳ θυμὸν ἰχῶν. εὐθετός, not 'fit,' but well adapted, 'the right sort of workman.' The sense is more immediately applicable to the ministry of the Gospel of Christ, which will least of all things bear a divided service and backward looks,—but of course affects also every private Christian, inasmuch as he too has a work to do,—ground to break, and a harvest to reap.

CHAP. X. 1—16.] MISSION OF THE SEVENTY. It is well that Luke has given us also the sending of the Twelve;—or we should have had some of the Commentators asserting that this was the same mission. The discourse addressed to the Seventy is in substance the same as that to the Twelve, as the similarity of their errand would lead us to suppose it would be. But there is, as Stier has well remarked (iii. 89, edn. 2), this weighty difference. The discourse in Matt. x. in its three great divisions (see notes there), speaks plainly of an office founded, and a ministry appointed, which was to involve a work, and embrace consequences, co-extensive, both in space and duration, with the world. Here, we have no such prospective view unfolded. The whole discourse is confined to the first division there (vv. 1—15), and relates entirely to present duties.

Their sending out was not to prove and strengthen their own faith, as Hase supposes (Leben J. p. 194),—but to prepare the way for this solemn journey of the Lord, the object of which was the announcement of the near approach of the kingdom of God,—and the termination of it, the last events at Jerusalem. Their mission being thus temporary, and expiring with their return, it is not to be wondered at that we hear nothing of them in the Acts. This last is surely an absurd objection to bring against the historic truth of their mission, seeing that the Acts are written by this same Evangelist, and the omission is therefore an argument for, and not against, that truth. 1.] μετὰ ταῦτα—chronological—after these things, not 'besides these things,' as Schleiermacher and Olsh. render it.

ἀνδ., an official word; see reff. Bleek has observed, that ὁ κύριος, of our Lord, in narration, is peculiar to St. Luke, and to narrations which he alone gives. Cf. ch. vii. 13; xi. 39; xii. 42; xiii. 15; xvii. 5, 6; xviii. 6; xxii. 31, 61. But this is only true of the Synoptic Gospels. It occurs in the fragment at the end of

St. Mark (xvi. 19), and in John (iv. 1 reff.). In the Acts, the usage is very general: see ii. 47; v. 9, 14; ix. 1, &c.; and in St. Paul's Epistles; see 1 Cor. vi.
 14, 17; vii. 10, &c. καὶ ἐτ. ἑβδ., not 'other seventy also,' but others also, seventy in number, see ch. xxiii. 32. The
 ἐτ. may refer, either to the Twelve, ch.
 ix. 1, or perhaps, from the similarity of their mission, to the ἄγγελοι in ch. ix. 52.
 But perhaps the first is more probable,
 from the similarity of the discourses.
 The number of seventy might perhaps have reference to the seventy elders of Israel, Exod. xxiv. 1; Numb. xi. 16:— all sorts of fanciful analogies have been found out and insisted on (and moreover forced into the text), which are not worth recounting. οὐ for of,—see reff.

2.] See Matt. ix. 37 and notes.

If ἐκβάλλῃ were read, the pres., as usual, would have the force of the continually repeated act: as it is, the aor. (as in || Mt.) indicates the whole mission, considered as one great act. 3. 4.] The time was now one of greater danger than at the mission of the Twelve; therefore
 ver. 3 is bound immediately up with their present sending, whereas in Matt.
 x. 16 it regards a time yet distant in the future; also one requiring greater haste,— which accounts for the addition, μηδὲνα π.

 for merely the healing the sick being enjoined, ver. 9. 6.] υἱὸς εἰρ., a

17—24.] RETURN OF THE SEVENTY. As in ch. ix. 6—10, Luke attaches the return of the Seventy very closely to their mission. They probably were not many days absent. They say nothing of the reception of their message,—or it is not brought out in the Gospel, as not immediately belonging to the great central object of narration; they rejoice that more power seems to be granted to them than even His words promised, seeing that He commissioned them only to heal the sick, not to cast out devils, as He did the Apostles, ch. ix. 1. That this was a ground of joy not to be prominently brought forward, is the purport of our Lord's answer; the whole of which as far as ver. 24 incl. is in the strictest connexion, and full of most weighty and deep truth. 17.] The ἐν τῷ ὀν. σου is perhaps too much lost sight of in the ἡμῖν here; though I would not lay so much stress on this as Stier has done.

18.] This verse has been generally misunderstood, and its force lost, by imagining it to refer to some triumph just gained, which our Lord announces as the reason for their newly manifested power. The truth is, that in this brief speech He sums up proleptically, as so often in the discourses in John, the whole great conflict with and defeat of the Power of evil, from the first even till accomplished by His own victory. The θεωρ. τ. σ. refers to the original fall of Satan, when he lost his place as an angel of light, not keeping his first estate; which fall however had been proceeding ever since step by step, and shall do so, till all things be put under the feet of Jesus who was made lower than the angels. And this θεωρουν belongs to the period before the foundation of the world when He abode in the bosom of the Father. He is to be (see ver. 22) the Great Victor over the Adversary, and this victory began when Satan fell from heaven. [In this fifth Edition, I would not altogether erase the foregoing interpretation: but surely it is grammatically more correct, with Bleek, to refer the imperfect to the time just past,—to the Lord's prophetic sight at the time of the ministering of the Seventy. Cf. Acts xviii. 5 for a similar imperfect. If this view be correct, the words do not refer to any "triumph just gained," but to the Lord's glorious anticipations of final triumph, felt during the exercise of power by His servants.]

Rom. i. 4: Heb. ix. 14: 1 Pet. iii. 18: see also Rom. xiv. 17: 1 Thess. i. 6. The ascription of praise, and the verses following, are here in the very closest connexion, and it is perfectly unimaginable that they should have been inserted in this place arbitrarily. The same has been said of their occurrence in Matt. xi. 25; and, from no love of harmonizing or escaping difficulties, but from a deep feeling of the inner spirit of both discourses, I am convinced that our Lord did utter, on the two separate occasions, these weighty words; and I find in them a most instructive instance of the way in which such central sayings were repeated by Him. It was not a rejoicing before (in Matt.), but a confession: compare the whole discourse and notes.

That the introductory words ἐν ἑκ. τ. ὧρ. = ἐν ἑκ. τῷ καιρῷ, may have been introduced from one passage into the other, and perhaps by some one who imagined them the same, I would willingly grant, if needful; not that, in the presence of such truths, such a trifle is worth mention, but that the shallow school of modern critics do mention, and rest upon such. On vv. 21, 22, see notes on Matt. xi. 25—27, observing here the gradual narrowing of the circle to which our Lord addresses himself, ver. 22, στραφ. πρ. τ. μ.,—then ver. 23 the same, with κατ' ιδιαν added.

23.] This verse should not be marked off from ver. 22 by a new paragraph, as is done in the E. V.: much less, as in the Gospel for the 13th Sunday after Trinity, joined with what follows: except perhaps that the lesson taught us by its occurring there is an appropriate one, as shewing us how the grace of Christian love, which is the subject of the following parable, fulfils and abounds over, legal obedience. It is in connexion with the preceding, and comes as the conclusion after the thanksgiving in ver. 21. A similar saying of our Lord occurs Matt. xiii. 16, 17, but uttered altogether on a different occasion and in a different connexion.

24. προφ. κ. βαρ.] David united both these, also Solomon. There may be an especial reference to the affecting last words of David, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1—5, which certainly are a prophecy of the Redeemer, and in which he says, ver. 5, "This is all my salvation, and all my desire, though he make it not to grow:"—see also Gen. xlix. 18.

25—37.] QUESTION OF A LAWYER: THE PARABLE OF THE GOOD SAMARITAN. Peculiar to Luke. As Stier remarks (iii. 101, edn. 2), it is well that Luke has related the other incident respecting an enquiry of the same kind, for the critics would be sure to have maintained that this incident was another report of Matt. xix. 16. Such clear cases as this should certainly teach us caution, where no such proof is given of the independence of different narratives: and should shew us that both questions addressed to our Lord, and answers from Him, were, as matter of fact, repeated. See however a case to which this remark does not apply, ch. ix. 57 ff. 25.] No immediate sequence from ver. 24 is implied. νομικός, a kind of scribe = νομοδιδάσκαλος, ch. v. 17—whose especial office it was to teach the law, see Tit. iii. 13; = εἰς τῶν γραμματίων, Mark xii. 28.

There is no reason to suppose that the lawyer had any hostile intention towards Jesus,—rather perhaps a self-righteous spirit (see ver. 29), which wanted to see what this Teacher could inform him, who knew so much already. Thus it was a tempting or trying of Jesus, though not to entangle Him: for whatever had been the answer, this could hardly have followed. τί ποιήσας] he doubtless expects to hear of some great deed; but our Lord refers him back to the Law of which he was a teacher.

26. πῶς δν.;] A common rabbinical formula for eliciting a text of Scripture.

πῶς is not merely = τί, but implies how? i. e. to what purport; so that the answer should contain a summary of his reading in the Law. 27.]

The first part of this, together with Dent. xi. 13 ff., the Jews had written on their phylacteries, and recited night and morning: but not the second; so that Kuinoel's idea that Jesus pointed to the phylactery of the lawyer, will not hold.

Meyer thinks the man answered thus, because he had before heard our Lord cite these in connexion, and with an especial view to asking the question τίς ἐστὶν μου πλησίον; It may have been so;—but I should rather believe the same spirit with which he began, to have carried him on to this second question. The words θάλ. δικ. εαυτ. seem to imply this, but see below. 29.] Meyer explains this; The questioner, having been by our Lord's enquiry, πῶς ἀνὰ, himself thrown into the position of the answerer, yet, θέλων δικ. εαυτ., wishing to carry out the purpose with which he asked at first, and to cover what otherwise would be his shame at being answered by so simple a reply, and that his own,—asks τίς ἐστὶν μου πλησίον;—I may observe that we need not take the whole of this explanation, but may well suppose that δικαίῶσαι εαυτ. may mean, 33—35.] The Samaritans were entirely, not half, Gentiles (= ἀλλογενής, ch. xvii. 18). Why our Lord mentions the name here, see below.

ἐπελελογεν. This was the great difference between the Samaritan and the others;—the actions which follow are but the expansion of this compassion. [ἔλαιον κ. οἶνον] These were usual remedies for wounds in the East; Galen, cited by Wetstein in loc., prescribes thus for a wound in the head, ἑλαιοῦ φύλλα τὰ ἀπαλῶτα τριψας παράχει ἑλαίου καὶ οἶνον μέλανος καὶ κατὰμασαι:—see also Isa. i. 6.

This is the only place where an inn, as we understand the word, a house for reception of travellers kept by a host, as distinguished from an empty caravanserai, is mentioned. The Rabbinical writers frequently speak of such, but under a name adopted from this word, מִשְׁכָּן (Wetstein). Bleek remarks that this serves to shew, that there were such inns in that neighbourhood, though certainly they were not frequent.

ἐξελθ. . . .] when he went on his journey. δύο δην.] some see in this, two days' wages (Matt. xx. 2).

36.] It will be observed that our Lord not only elicits the answer from the questioner himself, but that it comes in an inverted form. The lawyer had asked, to whom he was to understand himself obliged to fulfil the duties of neighbourhood? but the answer has for its subject one who fulfilled them to another. The reason of this is to be found,—partly in the relation of neighbourhood being mutual, so that if this man is my neighbour, I am his also;—but chiefly in the intention of our Lord to bring out a strong contrast by putting the hated and despised Samaritan in the active place, and thus to reflect back the ὁμολογία more pointedly. "Observe γεγονέναι, to have become neighbour. The neighbour Jews became strangers, the stranger Samaritan became neighbour, to the wounded traveller. It is not place, but love, which makes neighbourhood." Wordsworth.

to the ποιεῖς, which carries the main stress, the πορεύων being only secondary.

The lawyer does not answer—'The Samaritan': he avoids this; but he cannot avoid it in conviction and matter of fact.

ποιοὶ ὅμ., i. e. 'count all men thy neighbours and love them as thyself.'

The student accustomed to look at all below the surface of Scripture, will not miss the meaning which lies behind this parable, and which—while disclaiming all fanciful allegorizing of the text—I do not hesitate to say that our Lord Himself had in view when He uttered it. All acts of charity and mercy done here below, are but fragments and derivatives of that one great act of mercy which the Saviour came on earth to perform. And as He took on Him the nature of us all, being 'not ashamed to call us brethren,' counting us all His kindred,—so it is but natural that in holding up a mirror (for such is a parable) of the truth in this matter of duty, we should see in it not only the present and prominent group, but also Himself and His act of mercy behind. And thus we shall not (in spite of the scoffs which are sure to beset such an interpretation, from the superficial school of critics) give up the interpretation of the Fathers and other divines, who see in this poor traveller, going from the heavenly to the accursed city (Josh. vi. 26: 1 Kings xvi. 34),—the race of man, the Adam who fell;—in the robbers and murderers, him who was a murderer from the beginning (John viii. 44);—in the treatment of the traveller, the deep wounds and despoilment which we have inherited from the fall;—in the priest and the Levite passing by, the inefficacy of the law and sacrifice to heal and clothe us: Gal. iii. 21 (Trench remarks, Parables, p. 316, note, cdn. 4, that the Church, by joining the passage Gal. iii. 16—23 as Epistle, with this Parable as Gospel for the 13th Sunday after Trinity, has stamped this interpretation with her approval):—in the good Samaritan, Him of whom it was lately said, "Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?" (John viii. 48)—who came to bind up the broken-hearted, to give them the oil of joy for mourning (Isa. lxi. 1 ff.);—who for our sakes became poor, that we through His poverty might become rich: who, though now gone from us, has left with us precious gifts, and charged His ministers to feed His lambs, promising them, when the chief Shepherd shall appear, a crown of glory that fadeth not away (1 Pet. v. 2, 4). Further perhaps it is well not to go;—or, if we do, only in our own private meditations, where, if we have the great clue to such interpretations,—knowledge of Christ for ourselves, and a sound mind under the guidance of His Spirit,—we shall not go far wrong. But minutely to allegorize, is to bring the sound spiritual interpretation into disrepute, and throw stumbling-blocks in the way of many, who might otherwise arrive at it.

38—42.] ENTERTAINMENT OF OUR LORD AT THE HOUSE OF MARTHA AND MARY. It surely never could be doubted who this Martha and Mary were, nor where this took place,—but that the harmonizing spirit has so beclouded the sight of our critics. Bengel believes them not to be the sisters of Lazarus, but another Martha and Mary somewhere else;—and this in spite of the deep psychological identity of characters which meets us in John xi. xii.

Greswell, still more strangely, believes the persons to be the same, but that they had another residence in Galilee, and endeavours to establish this from John xi. 1 (where he says ἀπὸ only indicates residence, ἐκ origin; and the ἐκ is not Bethany, but the village in Galilee; see notes there). I shall, as elsewhere, take the text in its most obvious and simple interpretation, and where nothing definite is inserted in it, throw light on it from what we know from other sources. And I believe most readers will agree with me in taking these for the sisters of Lazarus, and the village for Bethany. "As regards the name Martha, it is in Aramaean ܡܪܬܐ, from ܡܪ dominus, and answers to the Greek κυρία." Bleek.

38.] ἐν τῷ πορ. need make no difficulty—the whole of the events related in this section of the Gospel are allotted, as in the widest sense they belonged, to the last journey of our Lord from Galilee, which ended in the triumphal entry into Jerusalem;—see note on ch. ix. 51 ff. Jesus, as we know that He afterwards did, so now probably, when at Jerusalem (at the feast of Dedication), abode at Bethany. He 'loved'—(only used in this sense by John with regard to this family, and to himself)—Martha and Mary and Lazarus—and this disciples, those who act from love (mistaken or otherwise) to Him—much as John vi. 27,—and will set before us the bread which perisheth on one hand, and that which endureth to everlasting life on the other. The ἀγαθὴ μερίς, the good portion, is the ἔν which is needful—see John vi. 53,—the feeding on the bread of life by faith; which faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the ῥῆμα χριστοῦ, which Mary was now receiving into her soul, and which (John vi. 54) shall never be taken away, but result in everlasting life. The two types of character have ever been found in the Church;

 both, caring for Him, and for love to Him doing what they do: but the one busy and restless, anxious, and stirring; the other quiet and humble, content to sit at His feet and learn. We see here which of the two He praises. But on the other hand we must not derive any argument hence against an active Christian life of doing good: this is, in fact, to sit at His feet and learn—to take His yoke on us, and learn of Him. It is the bustling about the πολλὰ of which there is no need, which is blamed; not the working out the fruits of the Spirit, which are needful, being parts themselves of the ἀγαθὴ μερίς.

CHAP. XI. 1—13.] JESUS TEACHES
 THE DISCIPLES TO PRAY. The locality and time of the following incident are alike indefinite. The only limits are those of the great journey which is the subject of this section. There is no reason for supposing this to be the only occasion on which the Lord delivered this prayer to His disciples. In the Sermon on the Mount, it stands in close connexion with what goes before;—and here also. In so weighty a summary of His teaching as that was, He was not likely, when speaking of prayer, to omit it;—when asked by His disciples to teach them to pray, He was not likely to depart from the form once given them. Such are ordinary probabili-ties, antecedent to every question affecting the two Gospels: and those critics who throw aside all such, are far more prejudiced in reality, than those who allow them full weight. "The peculiar and abridged form in Luke," says Meyer, "is a proof that the apostolic Church did not use the Lord's prayer as a form." Rather, we may say, a proof of the fidelity with which our Evangelist reproduced his original reports, not correcting them as others after him did (see var. readd.) to suit the forms most probably in use. If the apostolic Church did not use the Lord's Prayer as a form,—when did its use begin, which we find in every known Liturgy?

has not been conformed to Matt., because the doxology has never been inserted here, seems to me to tend in quite another direction: the doxology was inserted there, because that was the form in general liturgical use, and not here, because this form was never used liturgically.

π. ὀφείλοντι ἡμ.] This varied expression (see above) may serve to shew how far ‘Luke’s reporter’ (De Wette) was from misunderstanding the words of the Lord: that reporter, as Stier well observes, (Reden Jesu, iii. 126, edn. 2.) being no other than the Holy Spirit Himself, whose special guidance was promised in bringing to mind the things said by Jesus (John xiv. 26). 5.] Now follows a parable on continuing instant in prayer, of the same nature as that in ch. xviii. 2 ff. In both parables, the argument is ‘à fortiori,’ “if selfish man can be won by prayer and importunity to give, and unjust man to do right, much more certainly shall the bountiful Lord bestow, and the righteous Lord do justice.” Trench, Parables, in loc., who further remarks, that here intercessory prayer is the subject of the parable; there, personal. And, that we must remember that all reluctance on the part of God to answer our prayers is not real, but apparent only, and arises from deeper reasons working for our good: whereas the reluctance in these two parables is real, arising from selfishness and contempt of justice.

7.] We have an interesting fragment of domestic life here given us. The door is 'barred,' not only 'shut;' there is the trouble of unbarring it: the father and children are in bed (εις τ. κ. ελσ. ellipt. for 'have gone εις τ. κ. and are εν τῷ κ.' see reff.); (observe how in all the parables which place the Father, or the Husband, before us, the Mother, or the Bride, does not appear;) and he cannot (i. e. will not, cannot from being overcome by reluctance) rise and give to him.

8.] ἀναίδεια is too mildly rendered by 'importunity,' E. V. It should be shamelessness. It is presupposed here that the postulant goes on knocking and asking.

11—13.] Our Lord sets forth the certainty of our obtaining the Holy Spirit, (the unspeakable gift, in which all other δόματα ἀγαθὰ are included,) from our Father, by another 'à fortiori' argument, drawn from the love of earthly parents, so far less careful and tenderly wise than He is over His children. The construction, as before (ver. 5), is a mixed one: half interrogative, half hypothetical. For the rest, see notes on Matt. vii. 7 f. The egg and scorpion are added here. The serpent and scorpion are the positively mischievous: the samples, ch. x. 19, of the δύναμις τοῦ ἰχθυοῦ:—the stone, that which is simply unfit for food. neither useless nor mischievous things, but of His best gift—His Holy Spirit—in all the various and fitting manifestations of His guidance and consolation and teaching in our lives. This is (because this takes of and imparts to us by leading us continually to Him who is) the ἀπρος of the parable;—the ‘paterfamilias’ is our Father in Heaven, with whom however the night is as the day, who never slumbers nor sleeps. It has been noticed how by the hungry traveller coming to the man, may be imported, in the depth of the parable, the awakening in a man’s own soul (which is so precious to him) of that hunger which he has nothing to satisfy, and which none but God can satisfy. The student may, as in the foregoing parable, follow out this clue for himself (provided it be done soberly) with much interest and profit.

Notice that when we address God (Mt. vi. 9), He is ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐν τ. οὐρ.—when He answers us, He is ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐξ οὐρ. In the former case we go up into Him and His abode; in the latter He comes down to us. The construction is not (Meyer) ὁ ἐν οὐρανῷ ἐξ οὐρ. δώσει: but the one so common in good Greek, ὁ ἐκ Πιλοποννήσου πόλεμος, denoting the quarter whence the influence implied in the substantive comes, which here is the result of that relation implied in πατὴρ.

14—36.] ACCUSATION OF CASTING OUT DEVILS BY BEELZEBUB, AND DEMAND OF A SIGN FROM HEAVEN. OUR LORD’S DISCOURSE THEREUPON. Matt. xii. 22—45. Mark iii. 23—30. The reasonings of Greswell to shew that Luke relates an entirely different incident from Matt. and Mark, able and well conducted as they are, fail to carry conviction to my mind. The marks of identity are too many and striking to be mistaken; and on the plan of discrimination which he has adopted, I am persuaded that we might prove four distinct Crucifixions and Resurrections to have happened just as easily. Besides, it is quite impossible to carry the hypothesis throughout this section of Luke’s Gospel: and when it has been once given up, a considerable difference is made in the way of regarding the various narrations. On the side of which Evangelist the strict accuracy lies, it is next to impossible for us now to decide. I am inclined to think with Schleiermacher (transl., p. 190), that the section from ch. xi. 14—xii. 53 (or rather perhaps 59) is a connected whole, or, at all events, is intended to form such. But then the whole is introduced (ver. 14) without any mark of connexion with the preceding, and terminated as abruptly.

On the other hand, the narrative in Matt. is introduced by his usual τότε, following upon a very general description of a retirement of our Lord, and His being pursued by multitudes, all of whom He healed; but whether the οἱ ὄχλοι are the same, and the τότε meant to specify that this incident occurred then and there, is by no means certain. Nor is the close of the section (xii. 50) bound very closely to xiii. 1, which commences ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ, and can hardly be said with certainty to define the very same natural day. We may observe that the attendant circumstances, as introduced and closed in Mark iii. 20, iv. 1, are equally indeterminate. I therefore leave the difficulty where I found it, and where I believe it will ever remain, during our present state of imperfection: only observing, that the important incident and discourse grounded on it is no way thereby invalidated in authority. It seems to have been a portion of the evangelic history, the position of which was not exactly and satisfactorily fixed; of which there have been already some instances (see ch. ix. 57—62), and there are,

 as will be seen, yet more as we proceed.

14.] ^{κωφόν}—and blind, Matt. ver.
 22, where see notes on all the common matter.

15. τινὲς ἐξ αὐτ.] No inference can here be drawn that these persons were not Pharisees (as Greswell has done), and consequently that the charge proceeded from a different quarter.

16.] This is not mentioned here by Matt., but further on in the discourse, ver. 38.
 No distinction (Gresw.) can be drawn between σημ. and σημ. ἐξ οὐρ., for (1) our Lord answers the demand in both places by the same reply, the sign of Jonas; see also Matt. xvi. 1—4; and (2) the ordinary Jewish idea attached to σημ. would imply ἐξ οὐρ. : see notes on Matt. xvi. 1.

17.] εἰδώς : so Matt. also, ver. 25.
 οἶκ. ἐπὶ οἶκ.] The ordinary rendering and house (divided) against house, falleth, is certainly right. Before Meyer charged this interpretation with having entirely arisen out of harmonistic considerations, he should have ascertained whether such an expression as a kingdom falling οἶκος ἐπὶ οἶκον is even tolerable.

 The ruling idea of the saying having been given by the βασ. ἐφ' ἐαυτὴν, the emphatic pronoun need not be expressed again. Similarly we have, 1 Cor. ii. 11, τις οἶδεν ἀνθρώπων τὰ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, εἰ μὴ τὸ πν. τοῦ ἀνθρώπου τὸ ἐν αὐτῷ;
 the ὁ ἀνθρ. being the same throughout.

20.] ἐν δακτύλῳ θ. = ἐν πνεύματι
 θ. Matt. No distinction can be established, as Gresw. attempts. The one expression explains the other. What was done (Hebraistically speaking) by the finger of God, was done by the Spirit of God. We have much greater variations than this in sayings demonstrably the same. And as to what the same author maintains about the relative magnitude of the works of the finger, hand, and arm of God, a reference to ref. Ps., where the heavens are 'the works of Thy fingers,' will sufficiently shew how little reliance is to be placed on such subtilties.

²¹.] This parabolic sentence is in close connexion with many prophetic sayings, Isa. xl. 10 marg., liii. 12, and most pointedly Isa. xlix. 24, 25. It will be remembered that the Baptist called the Lord by this name, ὁ ἰσχυρότερος—placing after it, it is true, μου, but still using it as indicative of the Almightyness of the Son of God, rather than in comparison with himself.

The ισχυρός is the adversary, Satan; his αὐλή, this present world,—John xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11. His goods, or tools, or spoils,—τὰ ὑπάρχοντα = τὰ σκεῦη = τὰ σκεῦα,—are the sons of men,—2 Tim. ii. 26; 1 John v. 19 (Greek). With these he is clothed and armed, or rather with their evil capacities, which he furbishes and brightens for his use: with the πανοπλία τοῦ διαβόλου, compare by way of contrast, the πανοπλία τοῦ θεοῦ, Eph. vi. 11—20. Without these arms and tools he would be powerless: the evil one must have evil men—something receptive of evil—to work upon. But these the ἰσχυρότερος takes from him, and divides his spoils, Isa. liii. 12. He divides his spoils—turns to His own use and that of His followers all that good which the enemy had corrupted into evil.

The Stronger had already come into the strong man's house—the Saviour, into the world—and was robbing him of his captives, and making them into His own disciples—e. g. Mary Magdalene and others: but the work was not fully completed yet, till the Lord, by and in His death, overcame him that had the power of death, i. e. the devil. And that His great victory is still proceeding;—He is still taking from him one and another,—rescuing the sons of men by the power of His Gospel, till the end, when He shall (Rev. xx. 1 ff.) bind him in the abyss; and though he be loosed for the final conflict by His sufferance, shall cast him overthrown into the lake of fire for ever. Rev. xx. 14.

See on Matt. xii. 43. 27, 28.] This little but most instructive incident, here interposed, serves to shew the originality of Luke's account, and that, whatever its position may be, it is itself of the highest authority. The woman apparently was influenced by nothing but common-place and unintelligent wonder at the sayings and doings of Jesus:—and she broke out, with true womanly feeling, into a blessing of the mother who bare such a wonderful Teacher. Such seems to be the account of the incident itself.

Our Lord's reply is indeed wonderful:—(1) In reproof. He corrects in her the unapprehensiveness of his word, which had caused her to go no further into the meaning of it than this ordinary eulogy imported,—and gives her an admonition how to profit better by it in future.

(2) In humility. He disclaims all this kind of admiration for his humanity: and says not 'my word,' but the word of God, which is in fact the same, but takes the view off from Him in his abasement, unto the Father who sent Him.

(3) In truth. He does not deny the honour hereby pronounced upon his mother, but beautifully turns it to its true side—viz. that which was given her long since—μακαρία ἡ πιστεύσασα, ch. i. 45.

Her blessedness consisted not so much in being His mother, as in her lowly and faithful observance of the word of the Lord spoken to her; see ch. ii. 19, 51.

Nor again does He deny that to have borne Him was an honour—μὲν οὖν is 'imo vero'—'yes, indeed, but.' (4) In prophetic discernment. It will be seen that this answer cuts at the root of all Mariolatry, and shews us in what the true honour of that holy woman consisted,—in faith and obedience. As the mother of the Lord, she represents our human race, unto whom a child is born, a son is given; no individual exclusive honour is due to her, any more than to Cornelius, who was singled out from the Gentile world, and honoured by an angelic message relative to the divine purposes:—if she were, as there is every reason to conclude she was, a believer in her Son, the Son of man, she bore Christ in a far higher and more blessed sense than by being His mother in His humanity. And this honour may all believers in Him partake of with her; therefore the Lord says not ἡ ἀκούουσα τ. λ. . . . but οἱ ἀκούοντες. The last and boldest perversion of these words of our Lord by Father Newman, viz. that He thus does but still further exalt her honour, in that, besides being His mother, she heard His word and kept it, need only be mentioned, to shew the follies to which able men are abandoned, who once desert truth and simplicity.

29.] This is now in answer to those who sought of Him a sign from Heaven.

τῶν δχλ. επασθ. . . . perhaps in expectation, as He paused in His discourse, that the sign was now about to be shewn:—see notes on Matt. for the main subject. Here we have one part of the sign of Jonas brought out, which is not touched on in Matt., viz. his preaching after his resurrection to the Ninevites, announcing—for that would necessarily be involved in that preaching—the wonderful judgment of God in bringing him there,—and thus making his own deliverance, that he might preach to them, a sign to that people; which sign (ver. 32) they received, and repented;—

 here, seems to be for the sake of climax;— for the undervaluing and not appre-

 of His preaching of repentance.

^{33—36.} Our Lord goes on to speak of His teaching and miracles, which this generation despised, and demanded a sign from heaven in preference; He tells them that they will not see the significance of them, because they shut the eyes of their understanding, which should be the light of the soul;—this is set before them in a parable concerning the light of the body, which is the outward eye. The sen-

 the truth shines from a different side of them here. ^{33.} κρύπτην, (for so it

Atheneus, v. 205, describing a splendid ship built by Ptolemy Philopator, speaks of a κρύπτη φραγμοῖς καὶ θυρίαι περιχομένη πάντοθεν. 35.] σκόπει . . . μὴ . . . take heed, lest . . . and the ἐστίν, more forcible than ἦ, implies the actual existence, in the hearers, of the state against which they are cautioned: σκόπει μὴ ὁ νοῦς ὁ φωταγωγὸς τῆς ψυχῆς σου σκοτισθῇ ὑπὸ τῶν παθῶν, Euthym. 36.] "Tautological: the second member contains the same assertion as the first." (De Wette.)—Let us examine this. 'When thine eye is single (ver. 34),—i. e. simple,—straight and single-seeing,—thy whole body will be light.' Then (ver. 36),—'if this be so,—if thy whole body be light, having no part dark,—then it shall all be light as when a lamp with its brightness illuminates thee.' Of what is our Lord speaking? Of His teaching, as apprehended by the simple, single-seeing soul. If then the soul be so,—having no part darkened by prejudice or selfish lusts, and approach thus to His teaching, it shall be wholly illuminated by it, as by the candle of the Lord, searching its inward parts. So this saying, which, even as it stands, is not tautological,—for the second clause expresses the further result and waxing onward of the shining light, arising from the singleness of the eye,—becomes, in its spiritual significance, a weighty declaration of truth, answering to ch. viii. 15:—see also John viii. 12.

37—54.] DISCOURSE AGAINST THE PHARISEES. There can be no antecedent improbability in the supposition that our Lord spoke on various occasions, and with various incidental references, the component parts of that great anti-pharisaic discourse contained in Matt. xxiii. That was spoken in the temple, during the last week of His ministry; it formed the solemn close of His public teaching,—and at the end of it He departed out of the temple to return no more. I do not think it possible to suppose any part of that discourse in Matthew to be related otherwise than in its true place; all probability is against such an idea,—and so is the character of the reports of discourses in that Gospel, in general so strictly coherent and exact. There is then but one supposition left, unless we suppose Luke to have put together at random a number of fragments, and to have inserted them here, creating an occasion for them (for it amounts to this), which is equally inconceivable. And that is, that our Lord spoke at this meal, the occasion being the wonder of the Pharisee at His not washing before sitting down to meat, parts of that discourse, with which He afterwards solemnly closed His public ministry. See throughout, notes on Matt. xxiii. ³⁷] ἀριστήση, the morning meal.

^{εἰσελ. δι' ἀνέκασεν}] i. e. without any delay; as soon as He had entered, He sat down. ³⁸] The expression of this wonder is not stated, but is probable. Our Lord would hardly have so suddenly begun, ὑμεῖς οἱ Φ., unless something had been said, to which by assent they were parties. See His proceeding when nothing was said,—ch. vii. 39, 40.

^{ἵεβαπτ.} . . .] This use of the word shews that it did not imply necessarily immersion of the whole body;—for it was only the hands which the Pharisees washed before meat. ³⁹] There is not the least improbability or incongruity in our Lord's having thus spoken as a guest at a meal (as Strauss, Schleiermacher, De Wette, &c., maintain);—His solemn work of reproof and teaching was never suspended out of mere compliment,—nor were the intentions of the Pharisees towards Him so friendly as these invitations seem to imply. They were given mostly from deference to popular opinion, and from no love to Him;—sometimes even with a directly hostile object. See vv. 53, 54, and compare also ch. vii. 44—46. Observe also, that the severest parts of the discourse in Matt. (vv. 13—22, 33) were not uttered on this occasion.

ποτηρίου κ. πίνακος, and τὸ ἐσωθεν ὑμῶν; and a proposal has been made (to which I am surprised to see Bleek giving his adhesion) to take ὑμῶν with what follows: "the inside (of the cup and platter) is full of your plunder and wickedness." But surely all verisimilitude is against this, as well as the emphatic position thus given to ὑμῶν. The simple fact is, that the parable and its interpretation are intermixed throughout the whole, the mind of the hearer being left to find its own way in allotting each its part.

⁴⁰] seems clearly to me to be a question, and to mean, as E. V., Did not He, who made the outside, make the inside also?—i. e. if His works have become unclean and polluted through sin, what is the use of only partially purging them,—not accomplishing the purification?—must not the cleansing, to be good for any thing, extend to the whole?

The making ὁ ποιήσας to mean, 'he who has cleansed,' and a negative, instead of an interrogative sentence—'ye fools, he who has cleansed the outside has not cleansed the inside also'—gives, especially as the same was more strongly implied in ver. 39, the most frigid sense imaginable; and I can only (still, after his second edition) wonder that Stier, after Kuinoel and others, should have adopted it.

⁴¹] Here again I am compelled entirely to differ from Stier, who, with Erasmus, Lightfoot, Kuinoel, Schleiermacher, &c., understands this as ironical—'but ye give alms of their contents, and behold, all things are clean (in your estimation) to you.' But (1) this is inconsistent with the imperative δότε. (2) It would require ἐκ τῶν ἐνόντων, for the Pharisees did not give τὰ ἐνόντα in this sense. (3) It would be altogether irrelevant to the matter in hand, which was reproof to the Pharisees for their care about outward cleanliness, when the inside was left unclean. (4) It would be inconsistent with the emphatic position of τὰ ἐνόντα, which are thus pointed out as the true material, out of which to give alms. It would be altogether contrary to our Lord's usual habit of speaking about giving alms, to make Him cast a slur on it, as this would do: see Mark x. 21; ch. xii. 33, where the expression is very similar to this. The command is a rebuke for their covetousness (see ch. xvi. 14), which follows in close connexion with ἀπαργή and πονηρία, ver. 39. The τὰ ἐνόντα are the contents of the vessel, which vessel (ver. 39: see note above) is ὑμεῖς: = therefore, in its meaning, the rd ὑπάρχοντα of ch. xii. 33,—and the πάντα καθαρά ἐστιν answers to the θησαυρὸς ἐν οὐρανῷ of that verse, the result of which is the καρδία ἐν οὐρανῷ: and such persons being καθαροὶ τῇ καρδίᾳ,—to them, as τοῖς καθαροῖς, πάντα καθαρά (Tit. i. 15).

^{42.} But woe unto you, for ye do not this,—but make the most trifling payments, &c. The connexion, which is thus so close, is quite destroyed by the ironical interpretation of ver. 41. See note on Matt. xxiii. 23.

^{43.]} Matt. xxiii. 6, 7. There doubtless was ample illustration of this at the time and place when it was spoken.

^{44.]} See Matt. ver. 27;—but here the point of comparison is different. There (see note) the sepulchres are whitened, that men may not pass over them unawares: and the comparison is to the outside fairness, and inside abomination. Here, the graves are not seen, and men thinking they are walking on clean ground are defiled by passing over them. Perhaps the difference of expression may have been occasioned by the greater wealth and splendour and display of the Pharisees in the metropolis, where Matt. xxiii. was spoken.

Pharisee merely, but besides, a νομικός, whose duty it especially was to interpret the law. Perhaps he found himself involved in the censure of ver. 42; or generally among the other Pharisees. 46.] See on Matt. ver. 4. 47.] See on Matt. vv. 29—32. 48.] See on Matt. vv. 34—36. We have here a remarkable variation of expression in ver. 49, ἡ σοφία τοῦ θεοῦ εἶπεν here = ἐγώ, Matt. Various explanations have been given of this. The difficulty is not the variation just noticed, so much as that no such passage exists in the O. T. But I have little doubt that the true explanation is this:—the whole saying is a reference to 2 Chron. xxiv. 18—22, and so marked a one, that I am surprised no Commentators but Olshausen and Stier should have observed it, and they not thoroughly. That passage opens with remarks of the sacred historian on the delinquency of Judah and Jerusalem after the death of Jehoiada the priest: then ver. 19, 'He sent prophets to them, to bring them again to the Lord; and they testified against them: but they would not give ear. And the Spirit of God came upon Zechariah the son of Jehoiada the priest, which stood above the people, and said unto them . . . And they conspired against him, and stoned him with stones at the commandment of the king in the court of the house of the Lord. . . . And when he died, he said, The Lord look upon it, and require it.' The words in our text are not indeed a citation, but an amplification of ver. 19 there—a paraphrase of them, giving the true sense of what the wisdom of God intended by them;—enlarging the mere historical notice which laid hold of God's purpose only by one thread let down to the earth, into the divine revelation of the whole purpose of God as the counsel of His will in heaven. In Matt. the Lord Jesus Himself, as became the solemnity of that final and awful close of His testimony to His own who received Him not, stands forth as the doer of this work, the sender of the Prophets and Apostles. (On 'son of Barachias' see on Matt. ver. 35.) Perhaps the strangest solution of the difficulty above noticed is that of Meyer (second ed.), who supposes the words to have been inserted here from Matthew, and introduced as a quotation by ἡ σοφ. r. θ. εἶπεν, which Luke puts into the mouth of Jesus Himself, 'lâßt hier Jesum selbst reden.' Bleek attributes the fact of our Lord having made this event the terminus historicus of their murders of the prophets to the position of the books of Chronicles at the end of the Hebrew Canon: and uses it as a proof that appear to have assembled together again. If so, ἐν οἷς will mean. during which things, viz. those related above. He comes forth to them (ch. xi. 53) in the spirit of the discourse which He has just completed, and cautions his disciples against that part of the character of the Pharisees which was most dangerous to them. The connexion of these twelve verses may be thus enunciated:—Beware of hypocrisy (ver. 1), for all shall be made evident in the end (ver. 2), and ye are witnesses and sharers in this unfolding of the truth (ver. 3). In this your work, ye need not fear men; for your Father has you in His keeping (ver. 4—7)—and the confession of my name is a glorious thing (ver. 8), but the rejection of it (ver. 9), and especially the ascription of my works to the evil one (ver. 10), a fearful one. And in this confession ye shall be helped by the Holy Spirit in the hour of need (vv. 11, 12). 1. πρῶτον] I am not convinced by Olsh., De Wette, and Meyer, that this belongs to προσέχ. . . . Every instance which they quote of πρῶτον being thus used, is where some definite matter is subsequent to the thing said or done; e.g. Matt. vi. 33. But here is no such matter:—πρ. would only mean, 'earnestly,'—'be sure that you' . . . which meaning I do not think it bears. I have therefore coupled it with τοῖς μ. αὐτ., as distinguishing this section from what follows spoken to the crowd, ver. 13 ff. 13—21.] ANSWER TO ONE WHO SOUGHT A DIVISION OF HIS INHERITANCE. Peculiar to Luke. 13.] The man was evidently not a disciple, nor preparing to be one, (as Schleierm. thinks,) but some hearer in the crowd, whose mind had been working in him during our Lord's last sayings about the care of Providence for His friends, and he thought this was just the care his circumstances wanted; being, as appears, oppressed by his brother in the matter of his patrimony. Possibly too he had an idea that the Messiah, or the great Rabbi to whom he was listening, was come to set all things right;—and with that feeling which we all have of the surpassing injustice of our own wrongs, broke out with this inopportune request.

^{14.]} ἄνθρ., a word of solemn reproof; see Rom. ii. 1; ix. 20. The ἄνθρ.
 also forms a definite subject for ἡμᾶς to refer to, . . . 'men,' i.e. mankind in general. This question is expressed in almost the very words of the Egyptian rejecting the arbitration of Moses, Exod.
 ii. 14;—and may shew us the essential difference of the two offices of Moses and Christ.

^{15.]} αὐτούς, i.e. τὸν ὄχλον. He saw into the covetousness of the man's disposition, and made it an instructive warning for His hearers.

πάσης πλ. There is a meaning in πάσης—every kind of πλ. This kind, of which they had an example before them, was by no means one of the worst; but all kinds must be avoided.

οὐκ ἐν τ. . . .] not, because a man has abundance, does his life (therefore) consist in his goods.
 That is, no man's life ἐστὶν ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχ., consists in what He possesses; (οὐκ ἐν ἀρτῳ μόνῳ ζησεται ἄνθρωπος) . . . nor ἐν τῷ περισσεύειν τινι, by his having abundance, can this be made to be the case. Man's life is of God, not of his goods, however abundant they may be.
 And this is the lesson conveyed by the following parable, and lying at the foundation of the still higher lesson conveyed in ver. 21.

ζωή is life in the pregnan sense, emphatically his life; including time and eternity. This is self-evident from the parable and its application.

^{16.]} Our Lord in this parable sets before us one arrived at the very height of worldly prosperity, and that by no unfair means; 'non limite perturbato, non spoliato paupere, non circumvento sim-plice.' Aug. Sermon. 178, c. 2. It was by God's blessing that he became thus rich, which might have been a real blessing, if he had known how to use it.

 fantum Istæ sunt apothecæ quæ buthe, ch. vii. 37, p. 575.

^{18.]} "His
 folly is fourfold:—he forgets the Giver, ('my fruits, my goods,')—he greedily reserves all for himself; (συναῶ ἐκεῖ πάντα,) —he imagines such things to be food for his soul (ψυχῇ, . . . ἀναπ., φ., π., εὐφρ.)
 —he forgets death, which is every day possible." (Stier, iii. 146, edn. 2.) A very striking similarity is found in Sir. xi.
 18, 19, ἵσθι πλουτῶν ἀπὸ προκοχῆς καὶ σφιγγίας αὐτοῦ, καὶ αὐτῇ ἡ μίρις τοῦ ἀγαθῶν μου, καὶ οὐκ οἶδ' τίς καιρὸς παρελεύσεται, καὶ καταλείψει αὐτὰ ἐμίροις convincing proof that our Lord did occasionally refer to the Apocrypha (?).

20.] Ἀφρων, opposed to his worldly prudence;—ταύτη τῇ v. to the ἔτη πολλά;—the ψυχὴ in the one case, at its ease, eating, drinking, and making merry, to the ψυχὴ in the other, demanded, rendered up, judged. God said unto him,—perhaps it is meant, by some unmistakable judgment; but more likely, as occurring in a parable, the words are to be literally taken. By supposing merely a divine decree to be meant, without personal communication, as Grotius, Kuinoel, and Trench do, we lose the impressive part of the parable, where the man's selfishness and folly is brought into immediate contact with the solemn truth of his approaching death, which certainly our Lord intends us to contemplate. αἰτοῦσιν, not strictly impersonal; there are those whose business it is, even the angels, the ministers of the divine purposes: see ch. vi. 38 and note. The merely impersonal sense may be defended: cf. ver. 48: but this saying seems so solemn, as to require something more. ἃ ἡτοίμασας, which thou madest ready; but not for thyself.

21.] οὕτως, thus: in utter confusion, and sudden destitution of all help and provision for eternity. There is no ἔσται: because the case, alas, is an every-day one in every place. ἑαυτῇ . . . εἰς θεόν . . . The meaning of these expressions will be brought out thus: He who is rich for himself, laying up treasure for himself, is by so much robbing his real inward life, his life in and toward God, of its resources: he is laying up store for, providing for, the flesh; but the spirit, that which God looketh into and searcheth, is stripped of all its riches.

These words may also, as remarked on ch. vi. 20, shew that Luke does not, as supposed by some recent critics, use 'riches' as merely this world's wealth, but with a deeper spiritual meaning.

cities were at war. 32—34.] Our Lord gives to his own disciples an assurance of the Father's favour as a ground for removing all fear from them, and shews them the true riches, and how to seek them. τὸ μικ. π.] Thus He sets himself forth as their Shepherd (John x. 1 ff.), and them (as in Isa. xli. 10—14) as a weak and despised people. 33.] Meyer endeavours to evade the force of this, by supposing it addressed only to the Apostles and then existing disciples. But it is said to the μικρόν ποιμνιον, who are all the elect people of God. πωλ.] This is the true way of investing worldly wealth:—'He that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord.' See on Matt. vi. 19—21.

35—48.] EXHORTATIONS TO WATCHFULNESS. The attitude and employment of the μικρόν ποιμνιον is carried on, even to their duty of continual readiness for their Lord's coming. These verses are connected with ver. 32—'since your Father hath seen fit to give you the kingdom, be that kingdom, and preparation for it, your chief care.' There are continual points of similarity, in this part of the discourse, to Matt. xxiv. 42 ff., but no more: and the close connexion quite forbids us to imagine that the sayings have been collected merely by the Evangelist.

35.] There is a slight reference to, or rather another presentation of the truth set forth in, the parable of the virgins, Matt. xxv. 1 ff. But the image here is of servants waiting for their lord to return from the wedding;—left at home and bound to be in readiness to receive him. There is only a hint at the cause of his absence—He is gone to a wedding: γάμοι may mean almost any feast or entertainment—and the main thought here only is that He is away at a feast, and will return. But in the background lies the wedding in all its truth—not brought out here, but elsewhere, Matt. xxii. 1 ff.; xxv. 1 ff.

and the promise carried on yet further,—to the sharing of his Throne. The Lord himself, in that great day of his glory,—the marriage-supper of the Lamb,—will invert the order of human requirements (see ch. xvii. 8), and in the fulness of his grace and love will serve his brethren:—the Redeemer, his redeemed,—the Shepherd, his flock. ^{παρελθ.} coming in turn to each. Compare the washing of the disciples' feet in John xiii. 1 ff., which was a foreshewing of this last great act of self-abasing love. ^{38.]} Olsh. observes that the first watch is not named, because the marriage itself falls on it: but his view that because the fourth is not named, our Lord follows the ancient custom of the Jews and divides the night into three watches, is probably incorrect: it is more likely (Meyer) that the fourth is not named, because the return was not likely to be so long delayed;—for the decorum of the parable. ^{39.]} I am surprised that Schleiermacher can have imagined (transl. p. 198) that this verse has been inserted so as to break the connexion, and by a later hand. Nothing can be more exact and rigid than the connexion as it now stands. Our Lord transfers, to shew the unexpected nature of his coming, and the necessity of watchfulness, the relation between Himself and the servants, to that between the thief and the οἰκοδεσπότης. For the purposes of this verse, they represent the οἰκοδεσπότης—collectively, as put in charge with the Lord's house and household (thus the verse is intimately connected with ver. 42):—and in the further application, individually—each as the οἰκοδεσπότης of his own οἶκος, to be kept with watchfulness against that day:—He is represented by the thief—ἰδοὺ ἔρχομαι ὡς κλέπτης, Rev. xvi. 15; iii. 3. Olshausen's view that the οἶκος is the ἀρχὴν τοῦ κόσμου, τοῦτου, is surely quite out of keeping with the main features of the parable. That he should be put in the place of the watching servants (καὶ ἡμεῖς) seems impossible: besides that the πιστὸς οἰκονόμος below is this very οἶκος, being such in the absence of his Lord, but the οἰκονόμος when He appears. ^{41.]} τὴν παρ. τ. not, the two last verses (Stier), but the whole:—'Who are they that are thus to wait and watch, and to be thus honoured at the Lord's coming? This question, coming in so suddenly and unconnectedly and remaining apparently unanswered, is among the many proofs of the originality and historic reality of this discourse (against De Wette, &c.).

43 ff.] Our Lord does not answer the question directly, but proceeds with His discourse, so as to furnish it with an answer;—viz. that in its highest sense it applies to his Apostles and ministers, inasmuch as to them most has been given as the οἰκονόμοι—but that its application is gradationally downwards through all those who know their Master's will, even to the lowest, whose measure both of responsibility and of reward is more limited. For the comment on vv. 42—46 see on Matt. xxiv. 45—51. Notice that ἀπίστων here = ὑποκριτῶν in Matt.

47, 48.] primarily, in reference to the question in ver. 41, οἱ γνόντες = ἡμεῖς, the disciples.

οἱ μὴ γνόντες = πάντες, the multitude:—but the application is not limited to this: the truth is one of universal extent. The 47th verse needs little explanation:—after both πολλὰς and ὀλίγας, πληγὰς is to be supplied, see reff.: and cf. Aristoph., Nub. 959, ἐπερίβητο τυπτόμενος πολλὰς.

matters over which he has charge, ver. 35. There is reference to Deut. xxv. 2.

ὁ δὲ μὴ γν. [The case is of one (a disciple in the first reference, but then generally of all men) who bonâ fide is ignorant of his Lord's will. That such persons shall be punished, is both the sentence of the law, see Levit. v. 17—19, and an inference from the truth set forth ver. 57, and Rom. i. 19, 20, 32; ii. 14, 15, —that the natural conscience would have prevented the μὴ ποιῆσαι. (Observe that the two classes, not included here, are ὁ γνοὺς καὶ ποιῆσας, and ὁ μὴ γνοὺς καὶ ποιῆσας, as far as that can be said [see Rom. ii. 14];—the reference here being only to the μὴ ποιῆσας in both cases, or rather to the μὴ π. in the first case and its equivalent π. ἀξια πληγῶν in the second.) But the difficulty seems to be to assign a spiritual meaning to the δαρήσεται ὀλίγας. That such will be the case, would à priori be consonant to the justice of the Judge of all the earth: and we have it here declared, that it shall be so: but how, is not revealed to us. It is in vain for the sinner to encourage himself in sin from such a declaration as this: for the very knowledge of the declaration excludes him from the exemption. "Our ears have heard the voice divine; We cannot be as they." (Christian Year.)

περισσ.] perhaps, more than from others; but more likely more than had been deposited with him, viz. that, and the interest of it;—see Matt. xxv. 15 ff.

49—53.] The connexion appears to be this:—the immense and awful difference between the faithful and unfaithful servants brings our Lord to the ground of that difference, and its necessary development in the progress of His kingdom on earth.

49. πῦρ] It is extraordinary that the official announcement of the Baptist (ch. iii. 16)—αὐτὸς ὁμοῦς βαπτίσαι ἐν πν. ἁγ. καὶ πυρὶ—connected with the mention of a baptism here,—with the promise Acts i. 5, and the appearance Acts ii. 3, so strikingly expressed as διαμεριζόμενα γλῶσσαι ὡς πυρές,—have not kept the Commentators in general (Bleek is an exception) from falling into the blunder of imagining here that the fire is synonymous with, and means no more than, the discord and division which follow. The fire is, the gift of the Holy Spirit,—the great crowning result of the sufferings and triumph of the Lord Jesus. To follow this out in all its references belongs to another place:—see notes on Mark ix. 49, and Acts ii. 3. This fire, in its purifying and separating effects on the mass of mankind, causes the διαμερισμός afterwards spoken of.

The construction of τί θέλ. εἰ ἤδη. ἔν. has been ever a matter of dispute, while the meaning is on all hands nearly agreed. The three prevalent explanations of it are: (1) which is Origen's (appy), and is adopted by Grot., and defended by Meyer and Stier,—making εἰ = εἴθε, and rendering, And what will I? would that it were already kindled! Certainly thus there is nothing forced in the construction; we have εἰ for 'utinam' joined with an aorist in Josh. vii. 7;—but the abrupt short ejaculation seems unlike the usual character of our Lord's discourses. It is true the structure of John xii. 27 affords an instance of a similar question, καὶ τί εἴπω; . . . and under similar circumstances, of His soul being troubled. (2) which Theophyl., Kuinoel, Olsh., De Wette, Bleek, &c. adopt, taking τί = ὥς, as some do, adopting that reading, in Matt. vii. 14 (but see note there), and εἰ = ὅτι, and rendering, How I wish that it were already kindled! But here we have serious difficulties of an idiomatic kind:—ri is apparently never thus used—and ti only after words of wondering, being grieved, &c.: see Mark xv. 44. (3) That of Euthym., Beza, &c., and the E. V., 'What will I, if it be already kindled?' i. e. τί πλέον θίλω ἰδὲν ἀνέφθῃ; τί πλέον ἀναμένω ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ; Euth. This also presents no constructional, but a very great contextual difficulty; for by ver. 50 it evidently was not yet kindled; and even if this were overcome, the expression, evidently a deep one of personal anxiety (and be it remembered Who said it), would be vapid and unmeaning in the extreme. All things then being considered, I prefer the first explanation.

50.] The symbolic nature of Baptism is here to be borne in mind. Baptism = Death. The figure in the Sacrament is the drowning,—the burial, in the water, of the old man and the resurrection of the new man: see 1 Pet. iii. 20—22, and notes. The Lord's Baptism was His Death, in which the Body inherited from the first Adam (ἐν ὁμοιώματι σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας) was buried, and the new Body (τὸ σῶμα τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ) raised again: see Rom. vi. 1—11, but especially ver. 10. And He was straitened

(the best possible rendering) till this was accomplished:—i. e. in anxiety and trouble of spirit.

The 54 here implies, but first, i. e. before that fire can be shed abroad. Here we have then, as Stier expresses it, a 'passio inchoata' of our Lord; the first utterance of that deep anguish, which afterwards broke forth so plentifully, —but coupled at the same time with holy zeal for the great work to be accomplished.

51—53.] The work of this fire, as it burns onward in the world, will not be peace, but division; see Mal. iii. 2, 3, 18; iv. 1, where we have the separating effect of this fire in its completion at the great day: see also Matt. iii. 12. On the passage itself, see notes on Matt. x. 35, 36.

54—59.] REPROACHES FOR BLINDNESS TO THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES. The connexion of this with the foregoing is natural and close. ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν (ver. 52), the distinction shall begin to be made;—the discord and division between those who discern τὸν καιρὸν τούτου (ver. 56) and those who do not. Our Lord then turns to the crowd (καὶ. He not only said to the disciples the foregoing, but also to the crowd the following) and reproaches them (1) for their blindness, in not being able to discern it, as they did the signs in the natural heavens; and (2) for their want of prudence (vv. 57—59), in not repenting and becoming reconciled to the law of God while yet there was time. Schleiermacher and De Wette can discover no connexion, and yet the latter thinks Luke inserted the sayings of vv. 54—56 out of Matt. xvi., because of vv. 49 ff.

54.] There is a somewhat similar saying of our Lord at Matt. xvi. 2 ff., but differing both in its occasion and its substance. την νεφ., just as τας νεφιλας, —the cloud,—that usually rises there: see 1 Kings xviii. 44. The west, in Judæa, would be the direction of the sea.

The signs of this time were very plain;—the sceptre had departed from Judah;—the general expectation of the coming of the Messiah is testified even by profane authors;—the prophets had all spoken of Him, and the greatest of them, the Baptist, had announced His arrival.

57.] In what follows, our Lord takes occasion from the request about the inheritance, which had begun this discourse, to pass to infinitely more solemn matters. There is, I think, no denying that the κρίνετε το δίκ. and the δ αντιδικός σ. have a reference to that request, in the ability and duty of every man to 'judge what is right':—but the sense of the words far outruns that reference, and treats of loftier things. 'Why do ye not discern of yourselves your true state—that which is just—the justice of your case as before God? You are going (the course of your life is the journey) with your adversary (the just and holy law of God) before the magistrate (God Himself); therefore by the way take pains (δὸς λογ., da operam— a Latinism: there is no reference to interest of money, as Thl.,—who also has the other interpretation,—supposes) to be delivered from him (by repentance, and faith in the Son of God, see Ps. ii. 12), lest he drag thee to the judge (κριτής—who adjudges the case and inflicts the fine; that is, the Son, to whom all judgment is com-

CHAP. XIII. 1—9.] ANSWER TO IN-TELIGENCE OF THE MURDERED GALI-LEANS, AND PARABLE THEREUPON. Peculiar to Luke. ἐν αὐτ. τ. καιρ., may mean at that very time—viz. as He finished the foregoing discourse: but it is not necessary to interpret thus;—for,
 Matt. xii. 1; xiv. 1, the similar expression, ἐν ἐκείνῳ τ. κ., is certainly indefinite.
 πᾶς. . . . ἀπαγγ., came with the news,—
 not, as Stier supposes, 'were in the crowd, and remarked to the Lord concerning these Galileans,' in consequence of what He had said ch. xii. 57:—such a finding of connexion is too fine-drawn, and is a fault which we may excuse in Stier, for his many services in interpreting our Lord's discourses, but must not imitate. It is obvious that no connexion is intended between this incident and the foregoing discourse. πᾶσι τ. Γ.] The historical fact is otherwise unknown. The way of speaking here shews that it was well known to the writer. It must have occurred at some feast in Jerusalem, when riots often took place (see Jos. Antt. xvii. 9. 3; 10. 2), and in the outer court of the temple,

Such slaughters were frequent, and would not be particularly recorded by the historians. This mingling of their blood with their sacrifices seems to have been thought by the narrators evidence that they were very depraved sinners: for this was their argument, and is unconsciously that of many at this day,—'the worse
 the affliction, the more deserved:' see Gen. xlii. 21: Acts xxviii. 4. 2.] Our Lord perceives this to be their reasoning
 —they did not express it, as is plain by the δοκεῖτε ὅτι. . . . He does not deny that all the Galileans were sinners, and deserved God's judgments, but that these were pre-eminently so. The ἀσάντως (the force of which is lost in the E. V., 'likewise') should be rendered in like manner, as indeed the Jewish people did perish by the sword of the Romans. 4, 5.] Our Lord introduces this incident as shewing that whether the hand of man or (so called) accidents, lead to inflictions of this kind, it is in fact but one Hand which doeth it all—Amos iii. 6. There is also a transference from the Galileans—a despised people—to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, on whom the fullness of God's wrath was to be poured out in case of impenitence. Of the incident itself, or of the tower in Siloam (probably the district in which the fountain, John ix. 7, was situated,—though on the whole matter, and the situation of the fountain itself, there is considerable uncertainty), we know nothing. Josephus says of the wall of the ancient city, πρὸς νότον ὑπὲρ τὴν Σιλωὰμ ἱπιστρίφον πηγὴν, B. J. v. 4. 2: see also Neh. iii. 15. In B. J. vi. 7. 2, he uses μίχρι τοῦ Σιλωὰμ, as here, meaning apparently a district of the city: see on John i. c. ὀφειλάτας, sinners,—see Matt. vi. 12;—perhaps the same thought may be traced as pervading the saying, as in vv. 58, 59, of the last chapter. (No such idea as that the tower was a prison for debtors is for a moment to be thought of.)

See on ὡσαύτως above,—similarly—in the ruin of your whole city. This does not render it necessary that these words should have been spoken to actual dwellers in Jerusalem: for nearly the whole nation was assembled there at the time of the siege. 6—9.] This Parable has perhaps been interpreted with hardly enough reference to its own peculiar context, or to the symbolic language of Scripture in other places. Ordinarily (also in Trench, Par. in loc.) the owner of the vineyard is explained to be the Eternal Father: the dresser and intercessor, the Son of God: the fig-tree, the whole Jewish people: the vineyard, the world. But it may be objected to this, that the owner comes to seek the fruit, which can be properly said only of Him who εἰς τὰ ἴδια ἦλθεν—who is even in Matt. ὁ κληρονόμος—and by implication there, the possessor of the vineyard ὅταν ἔλθῃ (for that destruction He universally represents as His coming). The other objections will come out in the direct exposition of the Parable, which I take to be this:—The link which binds it to the foregoing is ἐὰν μὴ μετανοήτε . . . ; and it is addressed rather to individuals than to the whole nation—though of course to the whole nation as made up of individuals. The vineyard is not the world, which would be wholly inconsistent with Scripture symbolism (for Matt. xiii. 24 the comparison is to ἡ βασ. r. οὐρ.—the Gospel dispensation, in which the field—not the vineyard—is the whole world); but, as in Isa. v. 7, the house of Israel and the men of Judah (see notes on Matt. xxi. 33 ff.). The fig-tree planted in the vineyard—among the vines—(a usual thing) denotes an individual application, fixing each man's thought upon one tree—and that one, himself; just as the guest without the wedding-garment in Matt. xxii. He who had the tree planted in His vineyard (—All things that the Father hath, are Mine—John xvi. 15), came seeking fruit, and found it not: see Matt. xxi. 19 and note. (The vine-dresser, see below.) He commands it to be cut down, as encumbering the soil (exhausting it, rendering it inactive: see reff.); three years has He been coming and seeking fruit in this tree, and he findeth none. Then, at the intercession of the vine-dresser, He consents (for this is implied) to spare it this year also, until it has been manured; if that fail, the Intercessor himself has no more plea to urge—it is to be cut down. Now who is this Intercessor? First look at the matter of fact. Who were the vine-dressers of God's vineyard? They were many. Moses, the Prophets, the Baptist, the Lord Himself, the Apostles and Teachers after Him. But what one Personality might be set forth as pervading all these, 'striving with man' in them all—as being ὁ ἀμπελουργός? Clearly, it seems to me, the Holy Spirit of God. In the passage just alluded to, Gen. vi. 3, we can hardly but recognize the main features of our present parable; especially when the Days of Noah are compared by the Lord Himself to His own coming to vengeance. The intercessory office of the Spirit (ὁ παράκλητος, see on John xiv. 16), pleading with man and for man, and resigning that blessed conflict when met with inveterate obduracy, is often set before us in Scripture. (See the whole history of Saul; Zech. vii. 12—14: Prov. i. 23—32: Isa. lxiii. 10: Neh. ix. 20: Rom. viii. 26, 27.)

7. τρία ἔτη] I have little doubt (against Bleek, al.) that an allusion is intended to the three years of our Lord's ministry. The objection to this, that the cutting down ought then to have taken place at the end of τοῦτο τὸ ερος, does not apply; for all is left indefinite in the request and the implied answer. In the individual application, many thousands did bear fruit this very year; and of those who did not, who shall say when the Spirit ceased pleading with them, and the final sentence went forth? καὶ τ.

γ. κατ.] Why, besides bearing no fruit, is it impoverishing the soil? 8.]

σκ. καὶ βάλ. κ., dig holes about the root, and cast in manure, as is done (Trench in loc.) to orange-trees in the south of Italy: and to hops in England. 9.]

After καρπὸν, λείπει, τὸ εὖ ἔχει, Euthym. but not without reason: to fill up the aposiopesis did not belong to the purpose of this parable.

εἰς τὸ μέλλον, not ἔρος (Meyer), but indefinite (see ref.), hereafter:—and purposely so;—because, in the collective sense, the sentence lingered.

ἐκκόψης, Θεοῦ shalt cut it down—not ἐκκόψω; and I find in this an additional proof of the correctness of the foregoing interpretation. It is the κύριος τ. ἀμπελῶνος who ἔσαν ἑλθῶ, κακοῦς κακῶς ἀπολίσσει αὐτούς. All judgment is committed to THE SON—it is not the work of the Holy Spirit to cut down and destroy, for He is the Giver of life.

The above interpretation is partially given by Stier, who has however in my view (in his 2nd edn. also) quite missed the ἀμπελουργός, understanding by him the husbandmen in Matt. xxi., forgetting that they are destroyed in the sequel of that parable, and that their position, that of the tenants of the vineyard, does not appear at all in this, any more than does the ἀμπελουργός in that.

thoughts of his heart, that they were false, and inconsistent with his pretended zeal, and addressed the multitude as represented by him, their leader. A man hardly could give forth a doctrine so at variance with common sense and common practice, without some by-end, with which he covered his violation of truth. That by-end here was enmity to and jealousy of Jesus. The instance chosen exactly fits the circumstances. A beast tied to the manger is confined down as this poor woman was. 16.] The contrast is strongly drawn—between a dumb animal, and (not merely a human creature, but) a daughter of Abraham—one of the chosen people (I cannot see any necessity for a spiritual daughtership [Gal. iii. 7] being here implied),—between a few hours, since the last watering, and ‘lo these eighteen years’ (compare ver. 7, ἰδοὺ τρ. ἔτ.).

17.] So far am I from thinking a description of this kind to be a mere general close, put in by the Evangelist, that I would take it as an accurate and graphic account of the immediate effect of our Lord’s power and irresistible words, and the following parables as spoken immediately thereupon, shewing the people the ultimate conquest which the Kingdom of God should obtain over all opposition, however strong. On the parables themselves, see on Matt. xiii. 31—33.

journey, but disclaims any definiteness of place or time for it. But certainly it seems to follow in natural order after our Lord's solemn warnings to repentance at the beginning of this chapter.

The enquirer can hardly have been a disciple of Jesus (see ver. 28), but most likely a Jew from the multitude, who had heard his discourses, and either from Jewish pride, or perhaps from real desire to learn from Him, put this question. ^{23.}] On οἱ σωζόμενοι, see note, Acts ii. 47. Here, the implication of final salvation is obvious.

αὐτούς, the multitude. Similar sayings have occurred in the Sermon on the Mount, but the connexion here is intimate and strict. ^{24.}] See on Matt. vii. 13. The description of the broad and narrow ways is not here inserted, as probably by this time, ἡ στενὴ θύρα (or πύλη) was a familiar image.

[ἤτ. εἰς. κ. οὐκ ἴσχυ., not, 'shall seek to enter by it, and shall not be able':—the emphasis of the command is, seek to enter at the strait door: for many shall seek to enter (elsewhere), and shall not be able. After εἰσελθ., is to be supplied in both places, εἰς σωτηρίαν, or εἰς τ. βασι. τ. θεοῦ. This remark will dispose of the punctuation of Lachmann and Tischendorf in his former editions, who place only a comma at ἰσχύουσιν, and connect it with ἀφ' οὗ. ^{25.}] A reason why this ἀγωνίζεσθαι is so important:—because there will be a day when the gate will be shut. The figure is the usual one, —of a feast, at which the householder entertains (in this case) the members of his family. These being assembled, he rises and shuts the door, and none are afterwards admitted.

The ἀφ' οὗ extends to ἐστέ, end of ver. 25,—and the second member of the sentence begins with τότε. ἕξω ἐστάναι, and κρούειν both depend on ἀρξήσθε:—Hearing that the door is shut, ye begin to stand without and knock. On the spiritual import, see note on Matt. xxv. 11.

οὐκ οἶδ. π. ἐστέ, 'Ye are none of my family—have no relationship with me.'

^{26.} ἐφάγ. ἐν. σου κ. ἐπ. As applied to the then assembled crowd, these words refer to the miracles of feeding,—perhaps also to His having so often sat at meat in the houses of various persons (the κ. ἐπίομεν must not be pressed as meaning any thing different from ἐφάγ.:—the expression is a general one for taking a meal):—as applied to Christians, to the eating and drinking whereof those miracles were anticipatory. Both these are ἐνώπιόν σου merely,—in His presence;—very different from the drinking μεθ' ὑμῶν of which He speaks Matt. xxvi. 29, and from the διπνησω μετ' αὐτοῦ καὶ αὐτὸς μετ' ἐμοῦ, Rev. iii. 20.

ἐν τ. πλ. ἡμ. ἐδ., applicable directly to those to whom the words were spoken; and further, in its fuller sense, to all among whom the Gospel is preached, even till the end.

demn false prophets (as Grot., Lightf., &c. think), for the fact of ἀπολείσθαι only is here in question;—and our Lord never would place himself in such a category (Meyer).

34, 35.] These verses are in too close connexion with the preceding to allow of the supposition that they are inserted unchronologically, as Grot., Mey., De W., Neander, and even Schleierm. suppose: and their variations from those in Matthew (xxiii. 37—39) are striking and characteristic. For γάρ, which there accounts for the ἰσχυρία of the temple, then for the last time left by our Lord, does not appear here, but δὲ, introducing a fresh saying, having I believe another meaning: and the words ἀπ' ἀπρί, which follow ἰδὲ there, marking that moment as the commencement of the dereliction, are here omitted. Surely these differences indicate an uttering of the words prophetically, previous to their utterance in the act of departure. He overleaps in prophetic foresight the death just set forth as certain, and speaks of the ages to come, during which the holy city should be desolate and trodden down of the Gentiles.

That the very words εὐλ. δ' ἐρχ. κ.τ.λ. were used by the multitude at the Lord's entry into Jerusalem, I should much rather ascribe to a misunderstanding by them and the disciples of this very declaration, than for a moment suppose that these words found any sufficient fulfilment in that entry (Erasmus, Paulus, Wieseler).

φ. ἀπρ.] The Jews used to give entertainments on the Sabbath, see Neh. viii. 9—12; Tobit ii. 1. The practice latterly became an abuse,—'Hodiernus dies sabbati est: hunc in præsentī tempore otio quodam corporaliter

It does not appear, though it is certainly possible, that he was set there by the Pharisees on purpose. This was before the meal (ver. 7).

5.] There is a strict propriety in the comparison: the accident and disease are analogous.

υἱὸς ἡ βοῦς] This reading, which evidently was the original, seemed incompatible with the supposed argument à minori ad majus: υἱὸς was therefore altered to ὄνος (as in ch. xiii. 15) or πρόβατον (Mill and Bornemann conjectured ὄνος). But our Lord's argument is of another and a Vol. I.

far deeper kind. The stress is on ὁμῶν: and the point of comparison is the ownership, and consequent tender care, of the object in question. 'Those who are in your possession and care, whether belonging to your families, or your herds, are cared for, and rescued from perishing: am I, (the possessor of heaven and earth, —this lies in the background) to let mine perish without care or rescue?' There may be in the words the meaning 'son, or even ox;' but I prefer rendering them simply.

7—24.] SAYINGS OF OUR LORD AT THIS SABBATH FEAST. 7—11.] It does not appear that the foregoing miracle gave occasion to this saying; so that it is no objection to it, that it has no connexion with it. Our Lord, as was His practice, founds His instructions on what He saw happening before Him.

As Trench remarks, (Par. in loc.), it is probable this was a splendid entertainment, and the guests distinguished persons (ver. 12).

the middle place in the triclinium, which was the most honourable. At a large feast there would be many of these. 8.]
 The whole of this has, besides its plain reference, a deeper one, linked into it by the pregnant word γάμους, relating to the Kingdom of God. Both meanings are obvious, and only one remark needed;— that all that false humility, by which men put themselves lowest and dispraise themselves of set purpose to be placed higher,
 is, by the very nature of our Lord's parable, excluded: for that is not bona fide ταπεινούν αὐτὸν. The exaltation at the hands of the Host is not to be a subjective end to the guests, but will follow true humility.

 12—14.] The composition of the company before Him seems to have given occasion for this saying of our Lord. The Pharisee his host had doubtless, with the view (of watching Him) mentioned in ver. 1, invited the principal persons of the place,
 and with the intention of courting their favour, and getting a return. The Lord rebukes in him this spirit;—and it has been well remarked, that the intercourse

the city; in the country (Matt. xxii. 9, 10).

ἀνάγκασον els.] Is there not here an allusion to Infant Baptism? for remember, the εἰσελθόντες are good and bad.

(Matt. i. c.) 24.] I think with Stier,
(iii. 202, edn. 2) that our Lord here speaks in his own Person: ὑμῖν will fit no circumstance in the parable; for the householder and his servant are alone: the guests are not present. Our Lord speaks, with His usual λίγω γὰρ ὑμῖν, to the company present: and half continuing the parable, half expounding it, substitutes Himself for the master of the feast, leaving it hardly doubtful who ἄνδρες ἐκεῖνοι οἱ κεκλημέ-νοι are.

25—26.] DISCOURSE TO THE MULTI-TUDES. Our Lord is, at some time further on in the journey, going forward, and speaking to the multitude on counting the cost before any man becomes his disciple.

26, 27.] See Matt. x. 37, 38, and note. The remark there made of the strangeness of this sound of the Cross, still applies: our Lord had not yet announced his death by crucifixion. μισεῖ] It is well to enquire what sense this word here bears. That no such thing as active hatred can be meant, is plain: our Lord himself is an example to the contrary, John xix.

25—27: the hate is the general, not personal, feeling of alienation in the inmost heart,—so that this world's relationships, as belonging to the state of things in this world, are not the home and rest of the heart. This is evident from the ἔτι τε κ.
τ. εαυ. ψυχὴν which follows. Let the hate begin here, and little explanation will be further wanted. This addition also shews that the saying was not meant only for those times, in which more perhaps of the disruption of earthly ties was required, but for all time: for ἡ εαυτοῦ ψυχὴ is equally dear to every man in every age. It hardly need be observed that this hate is not only consistent with, but absolutely necessary to the very highest kind of love. It is that element in love which makes a man a wise and Christian friend,—not for time only, but for eternity. Beware of thinking, with Wordsw., that in εἶναι μου μαθητής,
there is any emphasis on μου. Rather is it in the least emphatic place in the sentence, in order to throw all the stress on the verb εἶναι: cf. ἵνα γεμισθῇ μου ὁ οἶκος, ver. 23; καταφαγὼν σου τὸν βίον, ch. xv. 30. In ver. 33, the collocation is different, and μου has a secondary emphasis. See remarks on this idea of Wordsworth's, in note on Matt. xvi. 18.

28—30.] Peculiar to Luke. The same caution is followed out in this parable. This is to be borne in mind, or it will be misinterpreted. The ground of the parable is, that entire self-renunciation is requisite, to become a disciple of Christ. This man wishes to build a tower: to raise that building (see 1 Cor. iii. 11—15), which we must rear on the one Foundation, and which shall be tried in the day of the Lord. He is advised to count the cost, to see whether he have enough thoroughly to finish it. If he begin, lay the foundation,—however seemingly well it may be done, it is not well done, because he has not enough to complete it: and the attempt can only lead to shame. So it is with one who would be Christ's disciple: but with this weighty difference, lying in the background of the parable—that in his case the counting the cost must always issue in a discovery of the utter inadequacy of his own resources, and the going out of himself for strength and means to build.

31—33.] This same lesson is even more pointedly set before us in the following parable, which, as well as the other, is frequently misunderstood. The two kings here are,—the man desirous to become a disciple, to work out his salvation,—and GOD, with whose just and holy law he is naturally at variance;—it is his αντιδικος, see ch. xii. 58, and note:—these two are going to engage in war; and the question for each man to sit down and ask himself is, 'Can I, with (ev,—clad in,—surrounded by, all that I have, all my instrument of war) my ten thousand, stand the charge of Him who cometh against me with (μετα, being only as many as He pleases to bring with Him for the purpose, see Ps. lxxviii. 17, E. V.) twenty thousand?'—see Job xv. 24—26. Here the inadequacy of man's resources is plainly set forth, not left, as in the former parable, to be inferred. Then, finding that he has no hope of prevailing,—ετι αὐτοῦ πρόφω δυντος, while there is yet time,—he sends an embassy, and sues for peace, abandoning the conflict: throwing himself upon the mere mercy and grace of God;—ἀπετασόμενος τᾶσιν τοῖς ἑαυτοῦ ὑπέρχουσιν, in both cases.

The ordinary misinterpretation of this parable is in taking the king with twenty thousand to be the ἀρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου—which destroys all the sense:—for with him the natural man is at peace, but the disciple of Christ at war.

³⁴, ³⁵.] For the third time, our Lord repeats the saying concerning salt: see Matt. v. 13: Mark ix. 50, and notes. The οὖν and καί, here restored to the text, are both valuable; the former as importing the recurrence of a saying known before,
 the latter as giving force to the supposition. The salt, in Scripture symbolism, is the whole life-retaining antiseptic influence of the Spirit of God:—this, working in the εἶναι μου μαθητής, is good:
 but if even this be corrupted—if the mere appearance of this, and not the veritable salt (which is the saviour), be in you—wherewith, &c.? Such a disciple is ἔξω βλητέος. Salt was not used for land, Ps.
 cvii. 34, nor for mingling with manure; it is of no use for either of those purposes, but must be utterly cast out.

CHAP. XV. PARABLES, SETTING FORTH GOD'S MERCY TO SINNERS. 1—7.] THE LOST SHEEP. It does not appear where or when this happened,—but certainly in the progress of this same journey, and, we may well believe, consecutively on the discourses in the last chapter. This first parable had been spoken by our Lord before, Matt. xviii. 12—14: but, as Trench has remarked, (Par. in loc.,) with a different view: there, to bring out the preciousness of each individual little one in the eyes of the good Shepherd; here, to shew that no sheep can have strayed so widely, but He will seek it and rejoice over it when found. The second is peculiar to Luke.

1.] ἦσαν ἐγγ., were busied
 in drawing near—were continually about Him, struck perhaps with penitence, —found, by His seeking them:—having come from the husks of a life of sin, to the bread of life;—so the three parables seem to imply.

Matt. ix. 10. Stier remarks (iii. 214, edn. 2) that this ἡμαρτ. προσδέχ. is an important and affecting testimony, from the mouth of the enemies of our Lord, to his willingness to receive sinners. The διευγγόγ. implies either throughout the journey;—or rather, one to another,—responsively. 3—7.] The man having the hundred sheep, is plainly the Son of God, the Good Shepherd. This had been his prophetic description, and that in this very connexion,—of seeking the lost, Ezek. xxxiv. 6, 11 ff. This it is which gives so peculiar an interest to David as a type of Christ—that he was a shepherd: ibid. ver. 23. Our Lord plainly declares then by this parable—and that I take to be the reason why it is placed first (see below)—that the matter in which they had found fault with Him was the very pursuit most in accordance with his divine Office of Shepherd.

4.] It is the Owner Himself who goes to seek, see Ezek., ver. 11—God in Christ. The ἑκατὸν πρόβ. are the house of Israel, see Matt. x. 6; but in the present application, mankind: (not, 'believers in Christ'; see on ver. 7.) The argument is to their self-interest: but the act on the part of the good Shepherd is, from the nature of the case, one of love; or, as Stier remarks, also human love for his own; for in Him, Love, and His glory, are one and the same thing. καταλ. τὰ ἑνν.] These pass altogether into the background, and are lost sight of. The character of the good Shepherd is a sufficient warrant for their being well cared for. The ἔρημος is not a barren place, but one abounding in pastures (John vi. 10, compared with Matt. xiv. 15). 5.] Not mere self-interest, but love comes forward here; see Isa. xl. 11:—no blows are given for the straying—no hard words—mercy to the lost one,—and joy within himself,—are the Shepherd's feeling; the sheep is weary with long wanderings,—He gives it rest. Matt. ix. 36; xi. 28.

6.] In this return to His house, must be understood the whole course of seeking and finding which the good Shepherd, either by Himself or His agents, now pursues in each individual case, even until He brings the lost sheep home into heaven to himself—not in reality, so that it should not take place till the death of the penitent—but prophetically,—till the name is written in heaven;—till the sinner is penitent. This is clear from the interpretation in ver. 7. The φίλοι καὶ γείτονας = the angels (and spirits of just men made perfect?). τὸ πρόβ. τὸ ἀπολωλός breathes a totally different thought from τ. δραχμὴν ἢν ἀπώλεσα. There is pity and love in it, which, from the nature of the case, the other does not admit of. 7. λέγω ὑμῖν] In these words the Lord often introduces His revelations of the unseen world of glory; see Matt. xviii. 10.

On these δικαιοι, see note at Matt. ix. 12, 13. They are the subjectively righteous, and this saying respects their own view of themselves. (Or if it be required that the words should be literally explained, seeing that these ninety-nine did not err,—then I see no other way but to suppose them, in the deeper meaning of the parable, to be the worlds that have not fallen;—and the one that has strayed, our human nature, in this our world.) But we have yet to enquire, what sort of sinner this parable represents: for each of the three sets before us a different type of the sinner sunk in his sin. Bengel, in distinguishing the three, says, 'Ovis, drachma, filius perditus—peccator (1) stupidus,—(2) sui plane nescius,—(3) sciens et voluntarius.' This one is the stupid and bewildered sinner, erring and straying away in ignorance and self-will from his Shepherd, but sought by the Shepherd, and fetched back with joy.

8—10.] THE LOST PIECE OF MONEY. In the following wonderful parable, we have the next class of sinners set before us, sought for and found by the power and work of the Spirit in the Church of Christ. It will be seen, as we proceed, how perfectly this interpretation comes out, not as a fancy, but as the very kernel and sense of the parable. The γυνή cannot be the Church absolutely, for the Church herself is a lost sheep at first, sought and found by the Shepherd. Rather is the οἰκία here the Church—as will come out by-and-by,—and the γυνή the indwelling Spirit, working in it. All men belong to this Creator-Spirit; all have been stamped with the image of God. But the sinner lies in the dust of sin and death and corruption—'sui plane nescius.' Then the Spirit, lighting the candle of the Lord (Prov. xx. 27; Zeph. i. 12), searching every corner and sweeping every unseen place, finds out the sinner; restores him to his true value as made for God's glory. This lighting and sweeping are to be understood of the office of the Spirit in the Church, in its various ways of seeking the sinner—by the preaching of repentance, by the Word of God read, &c. Then comes the joy again.

9.] αἱ φίλαι κ. γειτόνες are invited—but there is no return home now—nor in the explanation, ver. 10, is there any ἐν οὐρανῷ, because the Spirit abides in the Church—because the angels are present in the Church, see 1 Cor. xi. 10:—nor is it σοται (as in ver. 7 at the return of the Redeemer then future), but γινεται—the ministering spirits rejoice over every soul that is brought out of the dust of death into God's treasure-house by the searching of the blessed Spirit. In this parable then we have set before us the sinner who is unconscious of himself and his own real worth; who is lying, though in reality a precious coin, in the mire of this world, lost and valueless, till he is searched out by the blessed and gracious Spirit. And that such a search will be made, we are here assured. 11—32.] THE PRODIGAL SON. Peculiar to Luke. 'If we might venture here to make comparisons, as we do among the sayings of men, this parable of the Lord would rightly be called, the crown and pearl of all His parables.' Stier, iii. 227, edn. 2. We have here the glad and welcome reception of the returning sinner (sinner under the most aggravating circumstances) in the bosom of his heavenly Father: and agreeably to the circumstances under which the discourse was spoken, the δικαιοι who murmured at the publicans and sinners are represented under the figure of the elder son:—see below. The parable certainly was spoken on the same occasion as the preceding, and relates to the same subject. Dr. Wordsworth, who for the sake of upholding the patristic interpretation denies this, seems to me to have entirely missed the scope of the parable: see below. 11.] ἄνθ. τις—Our heavenly Father, the Creator and Possessor of all: not Christ, who ever represents Himself as a son, although frequently as a possessor or lord. 12.] υἱός, not, in any direct or primary sense of the Parable, the Jews and the Gentiles: that there may be an ulterior application to this effect, is only owing to the parable grasping the great central truths, of which the Jew and Gentile were, in their relation, illustrations,—and of which such illustrations are furnished wherever such differences occur. The two parties standing in the foreground of the parabolic mirror are, the Scribes and Pharisees as the elder son, the publicans and sinners as the younger:—all, Jews: all belonging to God's family. The mystery of the admission of the Gentiles into God's Church was not yet made known in any such manner as that they should be represented as of one family with the Jews:—not to mention that this interpretation fails in the very root of the Parable; for in strictness the Gentile should be the elder, the Jew not being constituted in his superiority till 2000 years after the Creation. The upholders of this interpretation forget that when we speak of the Jew as elder, and the Gentile as younger, it is in respect not of birth, but of this very return to and reception into the Father's house, which is not to be considered yet. Dr. Wordsworth's objections (in loc.) do not touch the reasons here given. The relations of elder and younger have a peculiar fitness for the characters to be filled by them, and are I believe chosen on that account; νεώτερον δὲ ονομάζει τὸν ἀμαρτωλὸν ὡς νηπιόφροντα καὶ ἐνέξαπάρτηνον. Euthym. 12, 13.] The part of the parable relating to the prodigal himself divides itself into three parts—1. his sin: 2. his misery: 3. his penitence. In these verses his sin is described. It consists in a desire to depart from his Father's house and control, and to set up for himself,—to live a life of what the carnal man calls liberty. 12.] τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος is classical Greek—ἀπολαχόντες τῶν κτημάτων τὸ ἐπιβάλλον, Herod. iv. 115. Such a request as this is shewn by Orientalists to have been known in the East, though not among the Jews. 13.] βίος = οὐσία:—no distinction is implied, as some (Paulus, Stier) have thought. The first-born had two-thirds of the property, see Deut. xxi. 17. The father, as implied in the parable, reserves to himself the power during his life over the portion of the first-born, see ver. 31. The parable sets before us very strikingly the permission of free will to man. 13.] μακράν—probably not adverbial (Stier), but agreeing with χώραν, see reff., and Æsch. Prom. 814, Xen. Cyr. v. 4. 47: compare however ἔθνη μακράν, Acts xxii. 21. The images of both the preceding parables are united here:—in ἀπεδημήσαν we have the straying sheep; in his state when he got into the far country, the lost piece of money. But in this case the search is to be carried on within him—we are now on higher ground than in those two parables.

'Regio longinqua est oblivio Dei,' Augustine. (Trench, in loc.) ἰσχύως] The old English word retchlessly expresses perhaps best the meaning, which is not 'unsparingly' (in which sense of 'saving money' I doubt ὥζω ever being used), but incorrigibly, past hope of reclaim:—ἰσχυρός, ὁ δὲ αὐτὸν ἀπολλύμενος, Aristot. Eth. iv. 1. 14-16.] His misery is set forth in these verses. He soon spends all:—there is a fine irony, as Stier remarks, in δαπανήσαντος, as compared with διεσκόρπισαν before—he spent his money for that which was no bread.

ἰλιμὸς ἰσχυρ.] On ἰλιμὸς fem., see note on ref. Acts. This famine is the shepherd seeking his stray sheep—the woman sweeping to find the lost. The famine, in the interpretation, is to be subjectively taken; he begins to be in want (no stress on αὐτοῦ, which is inserted on account of the change of subject from the last clause),—to feel the emptiness of soul which precedes either utter abandonment or true penitence.

15.] He sinks lower and lower—becomes the despised servant of an alien (is there here any hint at the situation of the publicans?) who employs him in an office most vile and odious to the mind of a Jew. ἐκολλήθη—no emphasis, see ref., he attached himself. Notice the abrupt change of subject, ἐκολλήθη . . . ἐπεμψεν.

16.] ἐπεθύμει—not merely he desired, see ch. xvi. 21, where the fact is surely implied that Lazarus did eat of the crumbs. The mistake has arisen from supplying a wrong object to ἐδίδου, and that from misunderstanding κεράτια. 'These are not the husks or pods of some other fruit, as of peas or beans, but themselves a fruit, that of the carob [or caruba, found not only in the East, but in South Europe, e. g. in abundance on the Riviera between Nice and Genoa. H. A.] tree (κεραυνία) . . . They are in shape something like a bean-pod, though larger and more curved, thence called κεράτιον or little horn, . . . they have a hard dark outside and a dull sweet taste . . . the shell or pod alone is eaten.' Trench, Par. in loc. His appetite even drove him to these for food;—for—καί, (implying his state of destitution) no man gave (ought) to him. Meyer, De Wette, Greswell, and others supply κεράτια after ἰδίδου, but wrongly, I think; the absolute use of δίδωμι being very frequent, and the other construction harsh and unusual. We see him now in the depth of his misery,—the sinner reaping the consequences of his sin in utter shame and extremity of need.

17-20.] His penitence. And here we have a weighty difference between the permitted rational free will of man, and the stupid wandering on of the sheep, or the inanimate coin lying till it is picked up,—both these being however true, did not God seek and save the sinner: 'the grace of God by Christ preventing us that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will?' In it he no where gives up his sonship: this, and the πᾶτερ, lie at the root of his penitence:—it is the thought of having sinned against (in the parable itself, Heaven and) Thee, which works now in him. And accordingly he does not resolve to ask to be made εἰς τῶν μισθ. but εἰς ἑνα r. μ.:—still a son, but as an hireling. "And what is it that gives the sinner now a sure ground of confidence, that returning to God he shall not be repelled, nor cast out? glances into the lesser occupations and recreations of human life, by which the Lord so often stamps his tacit approval on the joys and unbendings of men. Would these festal employments have been here mentioned by Him on so solemn and blessed an occasion, if they really were among those works of the devil which He came into the world to destroy?

28—32.] Stier well remarks (iii. 255, edn. 2) that this elder is now the lost son: he has lost all childlike filial feeling; he betrays the hypocrite within. The love and forbearance of the father are eminently shewn—the utter want of love and humility in the son strongly contrasted with them.

29.] Ἰδοὺ τὸς. ἔτη βουλ. σοι, the very manner of speech of a Pharisee: as is the continuation,—οὐδέτις. ἐντ. σου παρ. Could the Jewish nation be introduced saying this, even in the falsest hypocrisy?

30.] Ἰδοὺ τὸς. ἔτη βουλ. σοι, the younger son's δὲς μοι in ver. 12;—it is a separation of the individual son from his father, and, as there pointed out, the very root and ground of sin. ἔριφον, of less value than a calf. τ. φιλ.

μουν—who are these? this elder son also then has friends, who are not his father's friends: see Matt. xxii. 16, r. μαθητὰς αὐτῶν μετὰ τῶν Ἑβραίων.

30.] ὁ υἱ. σου οὗτος, the last degree of scorn and contempt,—just such as was shewn by the Pharisees towards the publicans and sinners (see ch. xviii. 11). 'I will not count such an impure person my brother.'

σου τ. βιον, a covert reproach of his father for having given it to him.

μετὰ τῶν πόρνων, a charitable addition on the part of the elder brother, such as those represented by him always take care to make under similar circumstances. Even supposing it a necessary inference from the kind of life which he had been leading, it was one which nothing but the bitterest jealousy would have uttered at such a time.

be assigned, and lie indeed in the background, suggested by his tone and words: but this is the soft answer to turn away wrath.

πάντ. τ. ἐμ. σά ἐσ., because the portion of goods which remained was his. 32.] εἶδε—not εἶδεν, but generally —it was right. The Father still asserts the restored sonship of his returned prodigal—ὁ ἀδελ. σου οὗτος. We may remark that the difficulties which have been found in the latter part of the parable, from the uncontradicted assertion in ver. 29, if the Pharisees are meant, —and the great pride and uncharitableness shewn, if really righteous persons are meant,—are considerably lightened by the consideration, that the contradiction of that assertion would have been beside the purpose of the parable; that it was the very thing on which the Pharisees prided themselves; that, besides, it is sufficiently contradicted in fact, by the spirit and words of the elder son. He was breaking his Father's commandment even when he made the assertion,—and the making it is part of his hypocrisy.

The result of the Father's entreaty is left purposely uncertain (see Trench, Par. in loc.):—is it possible that this should have been the case, had the Jewish nation been meant by the elder brother? But now, as he typifies a set of individuals who might themselves be (and many of them were) won by repentance,—it is thus broken off, to be closed by each individual for himself. For we are all in turn examples of the cases of both these brothers, containing the seeds of both evil courses in our hearts: but, thanks be to God, under that grace, which is sufficient and willing to seek and save us from both.

CHAP. XVI. 1—8.] PARABLE OF THE UNJUST STEWARD. Peculiar to Luke. No parable in the Gospels has been the subject of so much controversy as this: while, at the same time, the general stream of interpretation is well defined, and, in the main, satisfactory. It would be quite beyond the limits of a note to give any thing like a recension of the views respecting it: the principal ones which differ from that which I have adopted, will appear in the course of my remarks. 1.] ἔλεγεν εἰ καὶ—a continuation, I believe, of the foregoing:—certainly closely connected in subject with it, as is the second parable in this chapter also: see below.

πρὸς τ. μαθ., not to the Twelve only, but to the multitude of the disciples; and more immediately perhaps to the Publicans, whose reception by Him had been the occasion of this discourse. I say this because I believe them to hold a place, though not a principal or an exclusive one, in the application of the parable which follows.

ἀνθρ. τ. ἦν πλούσιος. . . .] The history in this parable is, in itself, purely worldly. The master is a νικὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος τοῦτον, as well as his steward: bear this in mind:—the whole parabolic machinery is from the standing-point of the children of this world. In the interpretation, this rich man is the Almighty Possessor of all things. This is the only tenable view. Meyer, who supposes him to be Mammon (defending it by the consideration that dismissal from his service = being received into everlasting habitations, which it does not.—see below), is involved in extricable difficulties further on. Olshausen's view, that he = the Devil, the ἀρχὴν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, will be found equally untenable. Schleiermacher's, that the Romans are intended, whose stewards the Publicans were, and that the debtors = the Jews, hardly needs refuting;—certainly not more refuting, than any consistent exposition will of itself furnish.

οἰκονόμον, a general overlooker—very much what we understand by an agent, or 'a man of business,' or, in the larger sense, a steward. They were generally of old, slaves: but this man is a freeman, from vv. 3, 4. This steward = especially the Publicans, but also all the disciples, i.e. every man in Christ's Church. We are all God's stewards, who commits to our trust His property:—each one's office is of larger or smaller trust and responsibility, according to the measure entrusted to him. I say, especially the Publicans, because the Twelve, and probably others, had relinquished all and followed Christ, and therefore the application of the parable to them would not be so direct: and also because I cannot but put together with this parable, and consider as perhaps prompted by it or the report of it, the profession of Zacchæus, ch. xix. 8. Other interpretations have been—the Pharisees (Vitrina, and recently Zyro, Theol. Stud. und Krit. for 1831)—but then the parable should have been addressed to them, which it was not,—and this view entirely fails in the application:—Judas Iscariot (Bertholdt), of the vindication of which view I am not in possession, and therefore can only generally say, that it is perfectly preposterous:—Pontius Pilate, &c. &c.

διδάσκων—not wrongfully, which the word does not imply necessarily—but maliciously, which it does imply: see Dan. vi. 24. The reason why it has come so generally to signify 'wrongful accusation,' is, that malicious charges are so frequently slanderous. The steward himself does not deny it. Meyer (see above) in carrying out his view, would interpret this charge as an accusation by the Pharisees against the disciples that they wasted the goods of Mammon by entering the service of Christ:—but then (1) this other service never once appears on the face of the parable; and (2) surely it would hardly be within the bounds of decorum that this διασκορπίζων should be the entering Christ's service;—this would bring a train of false interpretations with it, and even hold up the ἀδυσία of the steward, as such, for imitation.

διασκορπίζων—not that he had wasted (E. V.), but was wasting, his goods, ὡς διασκορπίζων = ὅτι δυσκόρπιζεν. So διέβαλλον ὡς λυμαινόμενον τὴν πολιτείαν, Xen. Hell. ii. 3. 23. In this charge (spiritually) we may see the real guilt of every man who is entrusted with the goods of our Heavenly Father. We are all 'scattering His goods.' If some one is to be found to answer to οἱ διαβάλλοντες, the analogy of ὁ διάβολος, 'the accuser of the brethren,' is too striking to escape us.

2. τί τοῦτο . . .] It makes very little difference either in admissibility of construction or of sense, whether we render 'why do I hear this of thee?' i. e. 'what is the ground of this report?—what occasion hast thou given for this being brought to me?' or, 'What is this that I hear of thee?' i. e. 'give some account of it.' There is the same ambiguity in Mark xi. 3, τί ποιεῖς τοῦτο; I prefer rather the former, because no opportunity of explanation what it is, is given him, but he is commanded to produce his books, to shew how it has arisen.

ἀπόδοι . . . give up the account of thy stewardship; for (taking for granted the correctness of the report, the steward not denying it) thou wilt not be able to retain thy stewardship any longer,—in ordinary English, thou canst not, &c.

οὐ δύνη—in the nature of things—thou art precluded from. The interpretation of this announcement to the steward, is the certainty, spoken by God in every one of our consciences, that we must give up and give an account of our stewardship at death. The great truth lies in the background, that that dismissal, death itself, is the consequence of the διασκορπίζω τὰ ὑπάρχοντα αὐτοῦ, —the wages of sin.

3.] The steward sets before himself the certainty of poverty and misery. He has not by his waste of his lord's property been laying up any store for himself;—that is not the point of the parable;—he has lived softly and effeminately, and cannot do an honest day's work:—σκάπτειν, for all manual labours; so Aristoph. Av. 1432, σκάπτειν γὰρ οὐκ ἵσταται. This speech, of digging and begging, must not be sought for in the interpretation; it belongs to the truth of the parable itself as introducing the scheme which follows, but has no ulterior meaning.

4.] ἔγνω—not = ἔγνων, which would be, 'I know, as part of my stock of knowledge, I am well aware,'—but implying, I have just arrived at the knowledge,—an idea has just struck me—I have a plan.

Observe, the aim of his scheme is that they may receive him into their houses,—give him shelter. This is made use of afterwards in the interpretation, for which see on ver. 9.

There does not appear to be any designed meaning in the variation of the amount deducted. We may easily conceive a reason, if we will, in the different circumstances of the debtors.

8.] ὁ κύριος—of course, the lord of the steward. The E. V. ought to have been expressed his lord, and there would have been no ambiguity.

τ. οἰκ. τῆς δόξ., not 'the steward for his injustices', but (see ref.) the unjust steward. He is not praised 'for his injustices'; see below.

ὅτι φρονίμως ἐπ., because he had acted shrewdly, cleverly for his own interest. The point brought out is not merely the shrewdness of the steward, but his lord, whose injury was wrought by this very shrewdness, praising it: for, our Saviour adds, the children of this world,—to which category both belonged—he who conceived and he who praised the shrewdness—are more shrewd, αἷ τ. γ. τ. ἑαυ.—for the purposes of their self-interest,—than the children of light. But this very τῶν ἰσ. indicates that there is a better and a higher γενεά, the family of light (John xii. 36; Rom. xiii. 12; Eph. v. 8; 1 Thess. v. 5), whose interests require a higher and better wisdom and foresight. It is hardly necessary to add that the discovery of the steward's trick by the master is essential to the parable, as exemplifying the φρονίμως and φρονιμώτερος. Had the master (as Wordsw.) merely seen the result, that the debtors received him into their houses, the praise could hardly have been put in this form. The σοφ. ποιῶσιν too seems to point at the past device, rather than the permanent result.

9.] We now pass to the application at once—from the mouth of our Lord Himself. All that is dishonest and furtive in the character of the steward belonged entirely to him as a υἱὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου: but even in this character there was a point to praise and imitate. And the dishonesty itself is not inserted without purpose—viz. to shew us how little the υἱοὶ τ. αἰ. τ. σκῆπτρου to use it, and how natural it is to them. Now, however, we stand on higher ground: καθαροὶ πάντα καθαρά:—in bringing up the example into the purer air which the children of light breathe, its grosser parts drop off, and the finer only remain.

καὶ ἐγὼ ὑμῖν λ. ἄρξας to recognize a necessary difference in the two situations:—'although you are children of the light and the day, and can do no such furtive acts, yet I say to you' This view will explain how we may make φίλους ἐκ τοῦ μαμ. τῆς δόξ. just as we can make an example for ourselves out of the οἰκονόμος τῆς ἀδικ. —that which is of itself τῆς ἀδικίας—which belongs to, is part of a system of, ἀδικία,—which is the very ρίζα πάντων τῶν κακῶν, the result, and the aptest concretion, of that system of meum and tuum (see ch. xv. 12) which is itself the result of sin having entered into the world. And we are to use this Mammon of unrighteousness to make ourselves, —not palaces, nor barns, nor estates, nor treasures,—but friends; i. e. to bestow it on the poor and needy—(see ch. xii. 33, which is the most striking parallel to our text—compare εἰς τὴν δόξαν, with θεσπυζόν ἀντιλεῖπον there) that when it shall fall,—they, i. e. the φίλοι—(compare the joy in heaven ch. xv. 7, 10, and Baxter's remark cited there by Stier—'Is there joy in heaven at thy conversion, and will there be none at thy glorification?') may receive you into the (or their) everlasting tabernacles. See also ch. xiv. 13, 14.

God repays in their name. They receive us there with joy, if they are gone before us; they receive us there by making us partakers of their prayers, which 'move the Hand that moves the world', εἰς ἐνώπιον. τ. ἀνθρ.—a contrast to ἡμαρτον ἐνώπιον σου, ch. xv. 18: and βδελυγ. ἐνώπιον τ. θεοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ, ch. xv. 10. 18.] See Matt. xi. 12 and note. After προφ. supply προφητευσαν, not (Meyer) ἱκηρύσσοντο, which would be inapplicable to the law and the prophets. The connexion is, —Ye are they that justify yourselves before men; ye are no publicans and sinners,—no poor and needy,—but righteous, and increased with this world's goods. But, since John, a kingdom has been preached, into which every one, publicans and sinners too (πᾶς || πάντες, ch. xv. 1) are pressing in. The true relation however of that kingdom to the law is not as ye suppose, to destroy the law (Matt. v. 17), but to fulfil! Then, as an example, our Lord reiterates the decision which He had before given on a point much controverted among the Jews—the law of adultery. But this He does, not without occasion given, and close connexion with the circumstances, and with what had before been said. As early as Tertullian, cont. Marc. iv. 34, p. 443, it was remarked, that an allusion was meant here to the adultery of Herod Antipas with his brother Philip's wife, which the Pharisees had tacitly sanctioned, thus allowing an open breach of that law which Christ came to fulfil. To this mention of Herod's crime the μέχρι Ἰωάννου gave relevance. Still the idea must not be too lightly assumed. Bleek's remark is worth notice, that, had such an allusion been intended, the last words of the verse would have been otherwise expressed. Antipas had not married a divorced woman, but abducted a married woman from her husband. See on Matt. v. 32. 19—31.] Our Lord, in this closing parable, grasps the whole covetous and self-seeking character of the Pharisees, shews them a case in which it is carried to the utmost, by one who 'made no friends' with the unrighteous Mammon;—places in contrast with it a case of extreme destitution and poverty,—the very thing which the φιλαργυρος most abhorred;—and then passes over into the region beyond the grave, shewing them the contrast there also—and ending with a mysterious prophetic hint at the final rejection of the Kingdom of God and Himself by those for whom the law and prophets were insufficient to bring them to repentance. And while it does not appear that the φιλαργυρία of the Pharisees shewed itself in this particular way, our Lord here grasps the depravity by its root, which is, a godless and loveless self-seeking—saying in the heart, 'There is no God'—and acting accordingly.

The explanation of particular points see below. 19.] 84 connects this directly with what goes before; being an answer, not immediately to any thing said by the Pharisees, but to their scoffs at Him;—q. d. 'hear now a parable.'

ἀνθρ. πλ.] Tertullian thought (l. c.) that Herod was meant, and by Lazarus John; and this view has been taken by Paulus and Schleiermacher also: but surely with no probability. Our Lord might hint with stern rebuke at the present notorious crime of Herod, but can hardly be thought to have spoken thus of him. That the circumstances will in some measure apply to these two, is owing, as above in ch. xv., to the parable taking the general case, of which theirs was a particular instance. Zeller (refuted by Bleek in loc.) thinks that the rich man sets forth the Jews and the poor man the Gentiles. In my view, the very name of the poor man (see below) is a sufficient answer to this.

Observe, that this rich man is not accused of any flagrant crimes:—he lives, as the world would say, as became his means and station; he does not oppress nor spoil other men: he is simply a υἱὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, in the highest form.

πορφ. κ. βύσσ., the Tyrian costly purple—and the fine linen (for under clothing) from Egypt. εὐφρ. λαμπ., probably the E. V. is right—shred sumptuously: ‘epulabatur laute,’ Vulg. Others render it ‘enjoyed himself sumptuously.’

20.] The significant name Lazarus (= Eleazarus = γῆρᾱ, Deus auxilium) should have prevented the expositors from imagining this to be a true history. Perhaps by this name our Lord may have intended to fill in the character of the poor man, which indeed must otherwise be understood to be that of one who feared God.

ἔββ., was, or had been—cast down, i.e. was placed there on purpose to get what he could of alms. πυλῶνα, see on ref. Matt.: it was the portal, which led out of the προαύλιον into the αὐλή.

21.] It would seem that he did obtain this wish, and that, as in ch. xv. 16, the ἐπεθ. must mean, he looked for it, willingly took it. The ἀλλὰ καὶ seems also to imply, that he got the crumbs: this verse, relating the two points of contrast to the rich man: his only food, the crumbs, with which he longed to fill his belly, but could not:—his only clothing, nakedness and sores, and instead of the boon companions of the rich man, none to pity him but the dogs, who ἐπέλειχον—certainly in pity, not ‘dolorem exasperantes’ (Bengel)—his sores, as they do their own. Such was the state of the two in this world.

22.] The burial of Lazarus is not mentioned, διὰ τὸ ἀνημέλητον τῆς τῶν πτωχῶν ραφῆς, Euthym. This is the only admissible reason. Meyer rejects it as arbitrary, and not consistent with the received notions about Hades, in which not the soul only, but the whole man was after death—believing it to be meant that the angels carried Lazarus bodily into Paradise. But then his interpretation halts, when he comes to the burial of the rich man, whom he makes go down out of his grave into hell. The fact is, that in both cases the material corpse remains on this earth, buried or unburied; while that personality, to which universal consent rightly attributes sensibility to bliss and woe, and the feelings and parts of the body, the man’s real self, is translated into the other world.

(If, when parts of the body are removed, we still believe that we possess those limbs, and feel pain in them, why may not the disembodied spirit still subjectively exist in, and feel the sensations of, that corporeal system from which it is temporarily separated?)

ἀπενεχ. αὐτ. . . .] In the whole of this description, the following canon of interpretation may be safely laid down:—Though it is unnatural to suppose that our Lord would in such a parable formally reveal any new truth respecting the state of the dead,—yet, in conforming himself to the ordinary language current on these subjects, it is impossible to suppose that He, whose essence is Truth, could have assumed as existing any thing which does not exist. It would destroy the truth of our Lord's sayings, if we could conceive Him to have used popular language which did not point at truth. And accordingly, where such language was current, we find Him not adopting, but protesting against it: see Matt. xv. 5.

The bearing of the spirits of the just into bliss by the holy angels is only analogous to their other employments: see Matt. xiii. 41: Heb. i. 14. τ. κόλπ. Ἀβραάμ] The above remark does not apply here—for this, as a form of speech among the Jews, was not even by themselves understood in its strict literal sense; and though the purposes of the parable require this, ver. 23, no one would think of pressing it into a truth, but all would see in it the graphic filling up of a state which in itself is strictly actual. The expression εὐτυχ τῷ πτω signified the happy side of Hades, where all the Fathers were conceived as resting in bliss. In Joseph. de Macc. § 13 we have οὕτω γὰρ θανόντας ἡμᾶς Ἀβραάμ κ. ἴσ. κ. ἱακ. ὑποδίζονται εἰς τοὺς κόλπους αὐτῶν. No pre-eminence is signified, as in John xiii. 23;—all the blessed are spoken of as in Abraham's bosom. See also John i. 18.

The death of the rich man last should be remarked; Lazarus was taken soon from his sufferings; Dives was left longer, that he might have space to repent.

κ. ἐτάφη] There can be no doubt that the funeral is mentioned as being congruous to his station in life,—and, as Trench observes, 'in a sublime irony,'—implying that he had all things properly cared for; the purple and fine linen which he wore in life, not spared at his obsequies. See Meyer's interpretation above.

23. ἐν τ. ἄδρ] Hades, ἡνῶ, is the abode of all disembodied spirits till the resurrection; not, the place of torment,—much less hell, as understood commonly, in the E. V. Lazarus was also in Hades, but separate from Dives; one on the blissful, the other on the baleful side. It is the gates of Hades, the imprisonment of death, which shall not prevail against the Church (Matt. xvi. 18);—the Lord holds the key of Hades (Rev. i. 18);—Himself went into the same Hades, of which Paradise is a part.

ἐν βασιάνοις—not eternal condemnation;—for the judgment has not yet taken place; men can only be judged in the body, for the deeds done in the body:—but, the certainty and anticipation of it. ἐπάρας, not necessarily to a higher place, though that may be meant:—see ref.

On πάτερ Ἀβρ. see Matt. iii. 9. φλογί, not subjective only, though perhaps mainly. The omission of the article before βασιάνους points no doubt to subjective torments;—but where lies the limit between inner and outer to the disembodied? Hardened sinners have died crying 'Fire!'

²⁵.] The answer is solemn, calm, and fatherly;—there is no mocking, as is found in the Koran under the same circumstances; no grief, as is sometimes represented affecting the blessed spirits for the lot of the lost. (Klopstock, cited by Stier, iii. 319, edn. 2: 'Behmuth der himmlischen die verlorenen Seelen begleitet.') μνήσθητι. . .] Analogy gives us every reason to suppose, that in the disembodied state the whole life on earth will lie before the soul in all its thoughts, words, and deeds, like a map of the past journey before a traveller. ἀπέλαβες—not sufficiently expressed by 'receivedst,' E. V.:—it is analogous to ἀπικουσιν, Matt. vi. 2, 5, 16,—and expresses the receipt in full, the exhaustion of all claim on. Those that were good things to thee, τὰ ἀγ. σου, came to an end in thy lifetime: there are no more of them. What a weighty, precious word is this σου: were it not for it, De Wette and the like, who maintain that the only meaning of the parable is, 'Woe to the rich, but blessed are the poor'—would have found in this verse at least a specious defence for their view;—though even then τὰ ἀγ. would have implied the same, in fair interpretation. τὰ κακά pathy, is not to be wondered at; the misery of such will be very much heightened by the awakened and active state of those higher faculties and feelings which selfishness and the body kept down here.

²⁹.] ἡ πίστις ἐξ ἀκοῆς, ἡ δὲ ἀκοὴ διὰ ῥήματος χριστοῦ. Rom. x. 17. 'Auditu fidei salvamur, non apparitionibus.' Bengel. This verse furnishes a weighty testimony from our Lord Himself of the sufficiency then of the O. T. Scriptures for the salvation of the Jews. It is not so now.

³⁰, ³¹.] οὐχ(—not, 'they will not hear them.' he could not tell that, and besides, it would have taken away much of the ground of the answer of Abraham:—the word deprecates leaving their salvation in such uncertainty, as the chance of their hearing Moses and the prophets seems to him to imply.—'Leave it not so, when it might be at once and for ever done by sending them one from the dead.'

Abraham's answer, besides opening to us a depth in the human heart, has a plain application to the Pharisees, to whom the parable was spoken. They would not hear Moses and the Prophets:—Christ rose from the dead, but He did not go to them;—this verse is not so worded, 'they would have rejected Him, had He done so:—the fact merely is here supposed, and that in the very phrase which so often belongs to His own resurrection. They were not persuaded—did not believe, though One rose from the dead. To deny altogether this allusion, is to rest contented with merely the surface of the parable.

Observe, Abraham does not say, 'they will not repent'—but, 'they will not believe, be persuaded:' which is another and a deeper thing.

Luther does not seem to conclude rightly, that this disproves the possibility of appearances of the dead. It only says, that such appearances will not bring about faith in the human soul: but that they may not serve other ends in God's dealings with men, it does not assert. There is no gulf between the earth and Hades: and the very form of Abraham's answer, setting forth no impossibility in this second case, as in the former, would seem to imply its possibility, if requisite.

We can hardly pass over the identity of the name LAZARUS with that of Him who actually was recalled from the dead, but whose return, far from persuading the Pharisees, was the immediate exciting cause of their crowning act of unbelief.

CHAP. XVII. 1—10.] FURTHER DISCOURSES. The discourse appears to proceed onward from the foregoing.

the Gospels in which the Apostles are marked out as requesting or saying any thing to the Lord. They are amazed at the greatness of the faith which is to overcome σκανδαλα and forgive αμαρ- τηματα as in vv. 3, 4:—and pray that more faith may be added to them.

 this occasion some particular tree of the sort was close at hand, and furnished the instance, just as the Mount of Transfiguration in the former of those passages, and the Mount of Olives in the latter.

 common in Palestine, but still found there.

Your Master will enter into His, but your time will not yet come; and all the service which you can meanwhile do Him, is but that which is your bounden duty to do, — seeing that your body, soul, and spirit are His.' 7.] εὐθέως in the E. V. is wrongly joined with ἐρεῖ: it corresponds to μετὰ ταῦτα in ver. 8. 'Construendum; cito accumbere: cito cupiunt accumbere qui missis ceteris officiis fidem sibi summam conferri oportere putant.'

Bengel.

8.] εως φ. κ. π., till I shall have eaten and drunken: see ch. xii. 37, where a different assurance seems to be given. But our Lord is here speaking of what we in our state of services are to expect; there, of what in our state of manumission ('mensæ servos adhibere manumissioniserat species.' Grotius, citing from Ulpian) and adoption, the wonders of His grace will confer on us. Here the question is of right; there, of favour.

9.] Our Lord is not laying down rules for the behaviour of an earthly master to his servants, — but (see above) is speaking of the rightful state of relation between us, and Him whose we are, and whom we serve.

10.] This shews the sense of the parable, as applying to our own thoughts of ourselves, and the impossibility of any claim for our services to God. In Rom. vi. 23 (see also the foregoing verses) we have the true ground on which we look for eternal life set

11—19.] HEALING OF TEN LEPERS.
It does not appear to what part of the last journey this is to be referred. There is no reason for supposing it to have been subsequent to what has just been related:—this is not implied. It may have been at the very beginning of the journey. From the circumstance that these lepers were a mixed company of Jews and Samaritans, ὁ δὲ μ. Σ. κ. Γ. probably means 'between Samaria and Galilee,' on the frontiers of both. Meyer supposes αὐτὸς to mean 'He for his part'—separate from the others going up to the feast, who would go direct through Samaria. Xen. has διὰ μίσου δι' οὐκ οὐκων ποταμός, i. e. 'between these walls.' Anab. i. 4. 4. This seems to be || with Matt. xix. 1. The journey mentioned there would lead Him διὰ μίσου Σ. κ. Γ. 12.] πρόρρωθεν, see Levit. xiii. 46; Num. v. 2. The Rabbinical prescriptions as to the distances are given in Wetstein. Their misery had broken down the national distinction, and united them in one company.

On the nature of leprosy and its significance, see on Matt. viii. 2. 14.] One of our Lord's first miracles had been the healing of a leper; then he touched him and said, 'Be thou clean:' now He sinks as it were the healing, and keeps it in the background;—and why so? There may have been reasons unknown to us; but one we can plainly see, and that is, to bring out for the Church the lesson which the history yields. In their going away, in the absence of Jesus they are healed:
what need to go back and give Him thanks? Here was a trial of their love:
faith they had, enough to go, and enough to be cleansed: but love (with the one exception)—gratitude, they had not.

tor. 16. αὐτ. ἦν Σαμ.] Strauss supposes (and Hase, but doubtfully) from this, that the whole narrative arose out of a parable about Jews and Samaritans.
 Such an absurd notion is however not without its use for believers. Every miracle is a parable: our Lord did not work mere feats of supernatural power, but preached by His miracles as well as by His discourses. 17.] Were not the ten cleansed? but (of those ten) the nine, where (are they)? 18. ὁ ἄλλος οὗτος.] The Samaritans were Gentiles;—not a mixed race, as is sometimes erroneously supposed. They had a mixed religion, but were themselves originally from other countries: see 2 Kings xvii.
 24—41. There may have been a reason for the nine Jews not returning,—that they held the ceremonial duty imposed on them to be paramount, which the Samaritan might not rate so highly. That he was going to Mount Gerizim does not appear: from his being found with Jews,
 he probably would act as a Jew.
 19.] σέσωκέν σε—in a higher sense than the mere cleansing of his leprosy—theirs was merely the beholding of the brazen serpent with the outward eyes,—but his,
 with the eye of inward faith; and this faith saved him;—not only healed his body, but his soul.

20—37.] PROPHETIC ANSWER TO THE

PHARISEES. In this discourse we have several sayings which our Lord afterwards repeated in His last prophetic discourse to the four apostles on Mount Olivet; but much also which is peculiar to Luke, and most precious ('eine töstliche Perle,' De Wette). 20.] The question certainly is asked by the Pharisees, as all their questions were asked, with no good end in view: to entangle our Lord, or draw from Him some direct announcement which might be matter of accusation. μετὰ verb is used ch. xiv. 1 of the Pharisees rendered these words 'within you,' meaning this in a spiritual sense, 'in your hearts,' should have been prevented by reflecting that they are addressed to the Pharisees, in whose hearts it certainly was not. Nor could the expression in this connexion well bear this spiritual meaning potentially—i. e., in its nature, within your hearts. The words are too express and emphatic for this. We have the very expression, Xen. Anab. i. 10. 3,—ἀλλὰ καὶ renderings compared in Bleek's note.

 The kingdom of God was begun among them, and continues thus making its way in the world, without observation of men;
 so that whenever men can say 'lo here or lo there,'—whenever great 'revivals' or 'triumphs of the faith' can be pointed to, they stand self-condemned as not belonging to that kingdom. Thus we see that every such marked event in the history of the Church is by God's own hand as it were blotted and marred, so as not to deceive us into thinking that the kingdom has come. So it was at the Pentecostal era:—so at that of Constantine;—so at the Reformation. The meaning 'among you,' includes of course the deeper and personal one 'within each of you,' but the two are not convertible.

²².] This saying is taken up from ἐντὸς ἡμῶν ἐστιν.—He is among you,
who is the Bridegroom,—the Son of Man;
 —during whose presence ye cannot mourn,
 but when He shall be taken from you,
 you shall wish in vain for one of these days of His presence. Stier (iii. 362) thinks this addressed to the Pharisees also,

 and to apply to their recognizing too late in their future misery the Messiahship of Jesus:—but this does not appear from the text.

Meyer tries to prove this interpretation altogether wrong, from the ἐν τ. ἡμέραις τ. vi. τ. ἀνθ., ver. 26.
 But the words have the general meaning of the days of the Son of Man's presence, and this extends on to His future presence, or παρουσία, as well.
 Of course, if they hereafter desired to see one of the days of His presence, it would be a second or future presence.

34—36.] See on Matt. xxiv. 40, 41. Here, there are two references: (1) to the servants of the Lord in the midst of the world out of which they shall be separated: (2) to the separation of the faithful and unfaithful among themselves.

34.] indicates a closer relationship than that of mere fellow-workmen, and sets forth the division of even families in that day. 37.] ποῦ, not 'how?' (Kuinoel) but literal—where shall this happen? The disciples know not the universality of this which our Lord is announcing to them, and which His dark and awful saying proclaims, see note on it, Matt. xxiv. 28. Observe, there is no g word, except so far as the greater coming includes the lesser, in all this, of the destruction of Jerusalem. The future παρουσία of the Lord is the only subject: and thus it is an entirely distinct discourse from that in Matt. xxiv., or our ch. xxi.

CHAP. XVIII. 1—8.] THE UNJUST JUDGE. This parable, though not perhaps spoken in immediate unbroken sequence after the last discourse, evidently arose out of it:—perhaps was the fruit of a conversation with the disciples about the day of His coming and the mind with which they must expect it. For observe that in its direct application it is ecclesiastical; and not individual, but by a legitimate accommodation. The widow is the Church; the judge, her God and Father in heaven. The argument, as in the parable of the steward τῆς ἀδικίας, so in this of the ἐπαιτής τῆς ἀδικίας, is a fortiori: 'If such be the power of earnest entreaty, that it can win right even from a man sunk in selfishness and fearing neither God nor men, how much more will the right be done by the just and holy God in answer to the continued prayers of his elect: even though, when this very right is asserted in the world by the coming of the Son of Man, He may hardly find among his people the power to believe it—though few of them will have

E. V. The point of this part of the parable is, the extortion of right from such a man by importunity. His act was not an act of justice, but of injustice; his very ἐκδικησις was ἀδικία, because he did it from self-regard, and not from a sense of duty. He, like the steward above, ὀφθαλμῶν] from ὀφθαλμος, the part of the cheek immediately beneath the eye, signifies literally to smite in the face;—and proverbially (see reff.), to mortify or incessantly annoy. It answers exactly to the Latin obtundere, which Terence has in this sense, 'Ne me obtundas hac de re sapius,' Adelp. i. 2. 33; and al. fr.—Liv. 'Neque ego obtundam, sapius eadem nequicquam agendo.' ii. 15. The Greek word does not appear to be any where used in this sense;—so that the use of it here may be a Latinism, as Grotius thought. Meyer interprets it literally—'lest at last she should become desperate and come and strike me in the face.' It has been observed that the apostles acted from this very motive when they besought the Lord to send away the Syrophenician woman,—'for she cried after them.' Matt. xv. 23. [6.] On δ κ ο τ. δδ. see above.

and on ch. xvi. 9. 7.] The poor widow in this case (the forsaken Church, contending with her adversary the devil, 1 Pet. v. 8) has this additional claim, in which the right of her cause consists,—that she is the Elect of God,—His Beloved.

ἡμέρας κ. νυκτός] This answers to the πάντοτε in ver. 1, but is an amplification of it. κ. μακροθυμῇ and He delays his vengeance in their case:—and He, in their case, is long-suffering. 'Est in hac voce dilationis significatio, quæ ut debitori prodest, ita gravis est ei qui vim patitur.' Grotius. The rec. reading, μακροθυμῶν, conveys the same meaning, καὶ being understood as καίπερ. This is perhaps what the E. V. means by 'though He bear long with them,' which is ambiguous as it stands. The μακροθ. has no doubt a general reference also to God's dealing with man, see 2 Pet. iii. 9, 15.

8.] ἐν τάχει will not bear the meaning 'swiftly,' i.e. 'suddenly, when it comes,' but (see ref.) is shortly—soon, speedily, as E. V. And this is no inconsistency with μακροθυμῇ: see 2 Pet. iii. 8, 9.

πλὴν.] See the beginning of this note. This can hardly be, as Meyer interprets it, that the painful thought suddenly occurs to the Lord, how many there will be even at His coming who will not have received Him as the Messiah: for ἡ πίστις, though 'faith' generally, is yet here faith in reference to the object of the parable—faith which has endured in VOL. I.

prayer without fainting. Or the meaning may be general and objective; as in ref.

9—14.] THE PHARISEE AND THE PUBLICAN. This parable is spoken not to the Pharisees, for our Lord would not in their presence have chosen a Pharisee as an example; nor concerning the Pharisees, for then it would have been no parable—but to the people, and with reference to some among them (then and always) τοὺς πτω. οἱ ἐλθόντες δίκ., who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised other men. The parable describes an every day occurrence: the parabolic character is given by the concurrence and grouping of the two, and by the fact that each of these represents psychologically a class of persons.

9.] πρὸς, to, not concerning: it was concerning them, it is true;—but this word expresses that it was spoken to them. The usage of πρὸς in ver. 1 is no example for the sense concerning, for it is not there so used of persons, but with a neuter article and infinitive: εἰπὼν πρὸς αὐτοὺς παρ. is too general a phrase, to allow of any other interpretation than the ordinary one, where the context will bear it. πεπεισθ. ἐφ' ἑαυτ., not, 'were persuaded of themselves,' as Gresswell renders; but as E. V., trusted in them.

 to σταθεῖς: that would be καθ' ἑαυτὸν, see James ii. 17. He stood (in the ordinary place), and prayed thus with himself, as E. V.,—'apud animum suum':— such a prayer he would not dare to put up aloud (Meyer). The Church has admirably fitted to this parable the declaration of thankfulness in 1 Cor. xv. 9, 10 (the two being the Epistle and Gospel for the Eleventh Sunday after Trinity), also made by a Pharisee, and also on the ground 'that he was not as other men':— but how different in its whole spirit and effect! There, in the deepest humility, he ascribes it to the grace of God that he laboured more abundantly than they all; yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me.

 again, the law perhaps (but cf. Abraham's μακρόθεν—far from the Pharisee;—a con-

 he was not as other men, is furnished by the poor Publican in his humility acknowledging this by an act. οὐδὲ τ.

ὀφθ.—another contrast,—for we must here suppose that the Pharisee prayed with all significance of gesture, with eyes and hands uplifted (see Matt. vi. 5). There is a slight but true difference also in σταθεῖς of the Pharisee—'being put in position' (answering to 'being seated' of the other usual posture) and ἰστώς of the publican, —'standing';—coming in merely and remaining, in no studied place or posture.
 So Tacitus, Hist. iv. 72, 'stabant con-scientia flagitii mæsta fixis in terror oculis':—see also Ezra ix. 6. ἔκρυπ.

 There may be a stress on τῷ bef. ἁμαρτ.,
 'me the sinner.' Gresw. But see reff., where, as probably here, the art. is generic. It seems to me that any emphatic comparison here would somewhat detract from the solemnity and simplicity of the prayer (agst Stier, iii. 384, edn. 2).
 The τῷ rather implies, not comparison with others, but intense self-abasement:
 "sinner that I am." Nor are we to find any doctrinal meanings in Ἰδού.—we know of one only way, in which the prayer could be accomplished: but the 14.] The sense is, One returned home in the sight of God with his prayer answered, and that prayer had grasped the true object of prayer,—the forgiveness of sins (so that δεδ. is in the usual sense of the Epistles of Paul, justified before God—see ref.), the other prayed not for it, and obtained it not. Therefore he who would seek justification before God must seek it by humility and not by self-righteousness. ὅτι πᾶς δ' ὑψίων ἐαυτ. has been illustrated in the demeanour of the Pharisee;—ταπεινὸς. in his failure to obtain justification from God;—ταπεινὼν ἐαυτ. in that of the Publican;—ὑψωθήσ. in his obtaining the answer to his prayer, which was this justification. Thus the particular instance is bound up with the general truth.

15—17.] LITTLE CHILDREN BROUGHT TO CHRIST. Here the narrative of Luke again falls in with those of Matthew and Mark, after a divergence of nearly nine chapters, see note on ch. ix. 51.—Matt. xix. 13—15. Mark x. 13—16. The narrative part of our text is distinct from the two; the words of our Lord are verbatim as Mark; see notes on Matt. The place and time indicated here are the same as before, from ch. xvii. 11.

^{31—34.} FULLER DECLARATION OF HIS SUFFERINGS AND DEATH. Matt. xx. 17—19. Mark x. 32—34. The narrative of the journey now passes to the last section of it,—the going up to Jerusalem, properly so called; that which in Matt. and Mark forms the whole journey. We know from John xi. 54 that this journey took place from Ephraim, a city near the desert.

^{31.} The dative (commodi) τῷ υἱῷ belongs to γεγραμμένα—as in E. V.: see Winer in ref. ^{32.} The betrayal is omitted here, which is unaccountable if Luke saw Matthew's account, as also the omission of the crucifying, this being the first announcement of it; see a similar omission in ch. ix. 45.

^{34.} Peculiar to Luke. οὐδὲν τούτων—i. e. neither the sufferings nor the resurrection. All was as yet hidden from them, and it seems not to have been till very shortly before the event itself that they had any real expectation of its happening.

^{35—43.} HEALING OF A BLIND MAN AT THE ENTRANCE INTO JERICO. Matt. xx. 29—34. Mark x. 46—52, where see notes. I have on Matt. spoken of the discrepancy of his narrative from the two others. The supposition that they were two miracles is perfectly monstrous; and would at once destroy the credit of Matthew as a truthful narrator. If further proof of their identity were wanting to any one, we might find it in the fact that the following expressions are common to Mark and Luke. In Matt. of course they are in the plural, as he has two blind men.—ἐκάθητο παρὰ τ. ὁδὸν ἐπαίτων (προσαίτης ἐκ. π. τ. ὁδ.)—Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος (αρηνός)—ἐπειμὺν αὐτῷ ἵνα σιγήσῃ (σιωπ.)—αὐτὸς (ὁ) δὲ πολλῶ μᾶλλον ἔκραζεν υἱὲ Δ. ἐλίσσόν με—τί σοι θίλεις ποιῶσω (θ. π. σ.)—κύριε (βαβ-

It grows to a great size and height: see Winer, Realwörterbuch, under Maulbeerfeigenbaum. See also on ch. xvii. 6. Notice the changes of subject here, τ-ἀνίβη (Ζαχ.) . . . ἵνα ἴδῃ αὐτόν, ὅτι ἰκεῖνης ἤμελλεν (ὁ Ἰησ.) διέρ. . . κ. σπειύσας (Ζαχ.). See ch. xv. 15:—and a curious and characteristic note in Wordsw. here.

5.] The probability is, that our Lord's supernatural knowledge of man (see John i. 48—50) is intended to be understood as the means of his knowing Zacchæus: but the narrative does not absolutely exclude the supposition of a personal knowledge of Zacchæus on the part of some around Him. But of what possible import can such a question be, when the narrative plainly shews us that Jesus saw into his heart? Cannot He who knows the thoughts, call by the name also? μῆναι, probably over the night. See John i. 40. 8a, it is my purpose, or even more, I must; for especially in these last days of our Lord's ministry, every event is fixed and determined by a divine plan.

7.] The murmurers are Jews who were accompanying Him to Jerusalem, on the road to which Zacchæus's house lay (see ver. 1). παρὰ αὐμ. ἀνδρὶ belongs to καταλυσαι. His profession in life, and perhaps an unprincipled exercise of his power in it, had earned him this name with his fellow-countrymen. Cf. his confession in the next verse.

8.] This need not have taken place in the morning; much more probably it was immediately on our Lord's entrance into the house, while the multitude were yet murmuring in the court, and in their presence. Our Lord's answer, σήμερον . . . τῷ οἴκῳ τούτῳ, looks as if He were just entering the house, not just leaving it; and the σήμερον must be the same with that in ver. 5.

σταθεὶς has something formal and pre-determined about it: he stood forward, with some effort and resolve: see on ch. xviii. 11 ff.

11—27.] PARABLE OF THE MINE. Peculiar to Luke. By the introductory words, the parable must have been spoken in the house of Zaccheus, i. e. perhaps in the open room looking into the court, where probably many of the multitude were assembled. A parable very similar in some points to this was spoken by our Lord in His last great prophetic discourse, Matt. xxv. 14—30. Many modern Commentators (Calv. Olsh. Meyer [on Matt.], but not Schleierm. or De Wette) maintain that the two parables represent one and the same: if so, we must at once give up, not only the pretensions to historical accuracy on the part of our Gospels, (see ver. 11,) but all ideas that they furnish us with the words of our Lord any where: for the whole structure and incidents of the two are essentially different. If oral tradition thus varied before the Gospels were written, in the report of our Lord's spoken words, how can we know that He spoke any thing which they relate? If the Evangelists themselves altered, arranged, and accommodated those discourses, not only is the above the case, but their honesty is likewise impugned (see Prolegomena to Gospels). Besides, we shall here find the parable, in its very root and point of comparison, individual and distinct. Compare throughout the notes on Matt.

11.] The distance of Jericho from Jerusalem was 150 stadia = 15 English miles. ὅτι παραχρ.] They imagined that the present journey to Jerusalem, undertaken as it had been with such publicity and accompanied with such wonderful miracles, was for the purpose of revealing and establishing the Messianic kingdom. 12.] The groundwork of this part of the parable seems to have been derived from the history of Archelaus, son of Herod the Great. The kings of the Herodian family made journeys to Rome, to receive their basileiai. On Archelaus's doing so, the Jews sent after him a protest, which however was not listened to by Augustus. Joseph. Antt. xvii. 11. 1 ff. The situation was appropriate; for at Jericho was the royal palace which Archelaus had built with great magnificence. Jos. τὸ πλῆθος. τ. μ.] in the widest sense; = οἱ mostly on their minds, was the raising of Lazarus, John xii. 17, 18:—but as this perhaps was not known to Luke, we must understand him to mean, all that they had seen during their journey with Him. 38.] ἐν οὐρανῷ = ἐν ὑψίστοις, out the parallelism.

39, 40.] THE PHARISEES MURMUR:
 OUR LORD'S REPLY. Peculiar to Luke.

39.] These Pharisees could hardly in any sense be μαθηταί of Jesus. Their spirit was just that of modern Socinianism:
 the prophetic expressions used, and the lofty epithets applied to Him, who was merely in their view a διδάσκαλος, offended them.

40.] A proverbial expression —but probably not without reference to Habakkuk ii. 11.

41–44.] OUR LORD WEEPS OVER JERUSALEM. Peculiar (in this form) to Luke. 41.] Our Lord stood on the lower part of the Mount of Olives, whence the view of the city even now is very striking. What a history of divine Love and human ingratitude lay before him!

When He grieved, it was for the hardness of men's hearts: when He wept, in Bethany and here, it was over the fruits of sin.

For this present state of men, marriage is an ordained and natural thing; but in τῷ αἰῶνι ἑκείνῳ, which is by the context the state of the first resurrection (nothing being said of the rest of the dead, though the bare fact might be predicated of them also), they who are found worthy to obtain that state of life and the resurrection from the dead, are no longer under the ordinance of marriage: for neither can they any more die; i. e. they will have no need of a succession and renewal, which is the main purpose of marriage.

When Meyer says that the Lord only speaks of the risen, and has not here in His view the 'quick' at the time of His coming, it must be remembered that the 'change' which shall pass on them (1 Cor. xv. 51—54) shall put them into precisely the same ἀφθαρσία as the risen (compare ibid. ver. 42). 37.] καὶ M., that very Moses, whom you allege as shewing by inference the contrary. 38.] Ὁ πάντ. γ. ἀντ. f. see on Matt. vv. 31—33: but we have in this argument even a further generalization than in Matt. and Mark. There, it is a covenant relation on which the matter rests: here, a life of all, living and dead, in the sight of God,—so that none are annihilated,—but in the regard of Him who inhabiteth Eternity, the being of all is a living one, in all its changes. 39, 40.] Peculiar to Luke;—implied however in Matt. ver. 34.

41—44.] QUESTION RESPECTING CHRIST AND DAVID. Matt. xxii. 41—46; Mark xii. 35—37, where see notes. Luke omits the question of the lawyer, which occurred immediately on the gathering together of the Pharisees after the last incident. This question of our Lord seems to have followed close on that, which (and not that in vv. 27 ff. here) was their last to Him, Mark xii. 34. 41.] πρὸς αὐτούς, i. e. the Scribes. The same thing is signified by πῶς λῑγουσιν οἱ γρ. in Mark. In Matt. the question is addressed to the Pharisees. I mention these things as marks of the independence of the accounts. The underlying fact is, the Lord addressed the Pharisees and Scribes on a view which they (the Scribes, the Pharisees agreeing) entertained about the Messiah. Hence the three accounts diverge. 42.] Ὁ ἐν βίβλ. ψαλμ., Wordsw. says,

"added here as conveying information necessary to Gentile readers." This might be well, did the words occur in the Evangelist's narrative: but surely not, when they are in a discourse of our Lord. If His words were so loosely reported as this, where is any dependence on the accuracy of the Evangelists?

 should have made any difficulty, I am at a loss to imagine. The prophecies of vv. 7, 8 in Matt.,—ver. 8 in Mark,—and vv. 10, 11 here,—are a parenthetical warning of what shall happen before the τέλος. And then having stated, ἀρχὴ ὧδινων ταῦτα,— these things shall be the very beginning of the actual pangs themselves (see note on Matt.), the prophetic chronology is resumed from οὕτω τὸ τέλος in all three accounts; here, by distinct statement, πρὸ δὲ τούτων πάντων: in Mark by implication, βλέπετε δὲ ὑμ. ταυ. παρ. ὑμ., by which δι, the following words are thrown back to the βλέπετε before:—in Matthew by the gathering up of the parenthetical announcements as πάντα ταῦτα, and thus casting them off, as the ἀρχὴ ὧδινων belonging to the τέλος, before the discourse proceeds with the τότε taken up from ver. 6. The whole difficulty has arisen from not rightly apprehending the force of ὧδινων, as the death-throes of the end.

&c. ver. 28. What views of the discourses of our Lord must such an expositor have! — πληρ. καιροί ἐθν. — Who could suppose that καιροί ἐθνῶν should have been interpreted (by Meyer) the appointed time until the Gentiles shall have finished this judgment of wrath—to be ended by the παρουσία, within the lifetime of the hearers? The καιρ. ἐθν. (see reff.) are the end of the Gentile dispensation,—just as the καιρός of Jerusalem was the end, fulfilment, of the Jewish dispensation;—the great rejection of the Lord by the Gentile world, answering to its type, His rejection by the Jews, being finished, the καιρός shall come, of which the destruction of Jerusalem was a type.

καιροί = καιρός: no essential difference is to be insisted on. It is plural, because the ἐθνη are plural: each Gentile people having in turn its καιρός. 25, 26.] The greater part of these signs are peculiar to Luke. ἀπωρία ἡχους, despair on account of the noise—so Herodian (see Mey.) iv. 14. 1, ἐν ἀπορίᾳ . . . τοῦ πρακτεῖν.  are emphatic, recalling the thoughts to themselves, after the recounting of these outward signs.

 ing in καθημ.,—sitting securely.
³⁶. σταθ., to be set, i. e. by the angels—see Matt. ver. 31—before the glorified Son of Man.

³⁷, ³⁸.] Peculiar to Luke. These verses close the scene of our Lord's discourses in Jerusalem which began ch. xx. 1. It does not appear, as Meyer will have it, that Luke believed our Lord to have taught after this in the temple. Nothing is said to imply it—a general closing formula like this applies to what has been related.

³⁸. ᾠρθη. is literal,—not figurative, 'came eagerly,' as De Wette, &c. think, from several places in the LXX. There is no occasion for a figure here.

Luke relates nothing of any visits to Bethany. He has the name, incidentally only, in ch. xix. 29 and ch.
 xxiv. 50, where see note.

On the whole question regarding the history of the woman taken in adultery (see digest),

CHAP. XXII. 1, 2.] CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO KILL JESUS. Matt. xxvi. 1—5. Mark xiv. 1, 2. The account of Matt. is the fullest;—see notes there. The words here give us a mere compendium of what took place.

3—6.] COMPACT OF JUDAS WITH THEM TO BETRAY HIM. Matt. xxvi. 14—16. Mark xiv. 10, 11. Our account is strikingly peculiar and independent of the others. The expression εἰσῆλθ. εἰς σατ. is found in John xiii. 27,—and certainly in its proper place. Satan had not yet entered into Judas,—only (John xiii. 2) put it into his heart to betray our Lord. 4.] καὶ τοῖς στρατηγοῖς is peculiar to Luke: the others have merely the chief priests. On στρατ., see

Acts iv. 1. The Levitical guard of the temple would be consulted, because it had been of late especially in the temple that our Lord had become obnoxious to them (see ver. 53 and ch. xxi. 37, 38). The words συνεθ. and ἐξωμολ. here seem clearly to imply that the money was not now paid, but afterwards, when the treachery was accomplished;—see note on Matt. xvi. 16. ἅτερ ὅχλ. = παραμόνος, Theophyl., or perhaps χωμῆς θερόβορ, Euthym.

7—14.] PREPARATION FOR CELEBRATING THE PASSOVER. Matt. xxvi. 17—19. Mark xiv. 12—16. Our account is the fullest of the three, related however nearly to Mark's. ἦλθεν is not 'approprinquabat,' but 'venit.'—On this whole subject see notes on Matt. xxvi. 17, and

John xviii. 28. ἡ ὥρα, the legal time of the Passover being sacrificed. So the narrators in the three Gospels evidently intend. 8.] It was a solemn message, and for it were chosen the two chief Apostles. In the report of Matthew, the suggestion is represented as coming from the disciples themselves. The question, ποῦ θέλ. was asked, but only in reply to the command of our Lord. 10.] There can, I think, be no question that this direction was given in superhuman foresight, just as that in ch. xix. 30:—see also 1 Sam. x. 2—8, and Matt. xvii. 27. This person carrying water would probably be a slave, and the time, towards evening, the usual hour of fetching in water. 11.] The οἰκοδεσπ. was a man of some wealth, and could not be identical with the water-carrier (see notes on Matt.). κατάλ. is not here, as in ch. ii. 7, an inn, but a room set apart at this season of the feast, by residents in Jerusalem, in which parties coming from the country might eat the Passover. The question therefore would be well understood;—and the room being ἑστρωμένον, and as Mark adds, ἡτοιμον, would be no matter of surprise.

14.] The ὥρα was evening, see above on ver. 10, and Matt. xxvi. 20.

15—18.] Peculiar to Luke. The desire of our Lord to eat this His last Passover may be explained from ch. xii. 50: not merely from his depth of love for His disciples, though this formed an element in it,—see John xiii. 1 sq. The γὰρ in ver. 16 gives us the leading reason. παθεῖν.]

This is the only instance in the Gospels, of the absolute use of πάσχα, as in the Creed, 'He suffered.' We have several times πολλὰ παθεῖν, ch. ix. 22; xvii. 25; Matt. xvi. 21 al. ταῦτα παθεῖν, ch. xxiv. 26, and οὕτως παθεῖν ditto ver. 46.

16.] The full meaning of this declaration is to be sought in the words τοῦτο τὸ πάσχα.

the divine nature, and so cannot die.
When Meyer says that the Lord only speaks of the risen, and has not here in His view the 'quick' at the time of His coming, it must be remembered that the 'change' which shall pass on them (1 Cor.
xv. 51—54) shall put them into precisely the same ἀφθαρσία as the risen (compare ibid. ver. 42). 37.] καὶ Μ., that very Moses, whom you allege as shewing by inference the contrary. 38.] On πάντ.
γ. αὐτ. ζ. see on Matt. vv. 31—33: but we have in this argument even a further generalization than in Matt. and Mark.
There, it is a covenant relation on which the matter rests: here, a life of all, living and dead, in the sight of God,—so that none are annihilated,—but in the regard of Him who inhabiteth Eternity, the being of all is a living one, in all its changes. 39, 40.] Peculiar to Luke;—implied however in Matt. ver. 34, and Mark ver. 28.

41—44.] QUESTION RESPECTING
CHRIST AND DAVID. Matt. xxii. 41—46; Mark xii. 35—37, where see notes. Luke omits the question of the lawyer, which occurred immediately on the gathering together of the Pharisees after the last incident. This question of our Lord seems to have followed close on that, which (and not that in vv. 27 ff. here) was their last to Him, Mark xii. 34. 41.] πρὸς ἀνθρώπους, i. e. the Scribes. The same thing is signified by πῶς λέγουσιν οἱ γρ. in Mark. In Matt. the question is addressed to the Pharisees. I mention these things as marks of the independence of the accounts. The underlying fact is, the Lord addressed the Pharisees and Scribes on a view which they (the Scribes, the Pharisees agreeing) entertained about the Messiah.
Hence the three accounts diverge.

"added here as conveying information necessary to Gentile readers." This might be well, did the words occur in the Evangelist's narrative: but surely not, when they are in a discourse of our Lord. If His words were so loosely reported as this, where is any dependence on the accuracy of the Evangelists?

5—36.] PROPHECY OF HIS COMING, AND OF THE TIMES OF THE END. Matt. xxiv. 1—51 (xxv. 1—46). Mark xiii. 1—37. See notes on both, but especially on Matt. Meyer says truly in loc. that there is no trace in Luke of the discourse being delivered on the Mount of Olives—but he adds, that it belongs to the discourses in the temple, which begin ch. xx. 1, and that therefore Luke alone mentions ἀναθήματα. He seems to have overlooked the break at ver. 7, corresponding to the change of scene. All three speak of the opening incident as happening while He was departing from the temple; and Matt. and Mark, of the enquiry being made afterwards, on the Mount of Olives,—i. e. in the evening, when He had retired thither (ver. 37),

5.] Meyer has made the same mistake here, and spoken of the river as those to whom the discourse was delivered. The ἀναθήματα were many and precious. Tacitus, Hist. v. 8, calls it immense opulentia templum: and Jos. B. J. v. 5. 4, gives an account of the gilding, and golden vines (presented by Herod the Great) with bunches of grapes as large as a man, &c. in the temple: see also Antt. xv. 11. 3. 6.] ταῦτα α̅θ̅,—absolute: see refi.

7.] That Luke's account alone gives us no trace of a different scene or a different auditory, is a proof of its independence of the others; for how could any rational writer have omitted so interesting a matter of accurate detail, if he had been aware of it? οὖν, on account of what our Lord had said, ver. 6.

8.] δ κ. ἡγγ., i. e. the time of the Kingdom. They are the words, not of our Lord, but of the πολλοί: see on

&c. ver. 28. What views of the discourses of our Lord must such an expositor have! —πληρ. καιροί ἐθν.—Who could suppose that καιροί ἐθνῶν should have been interpreted (by Meyer) the appointed time until the Gentiles shall have finished this judgment of wrath—to be ended by the παρουσία, within the lifetime of the hearers? The καιρ. ἐθν. (see ref.) are the end of the Gentile dispensation,—just as the καιρός of Jerusalem was the end, fulfilment, of the Jewish dispensation;—the great rejection of the Lord by the Gentile world, answering to its type, His rejection by the Jews, being finished, the καιρός shall come, of which the destruction of Jerusalem was a type, καιροι = καιρός: no essential difference is to be insisted on. It is plural, because the ἔθνη are plural: each Gentile people having in turn its καιρός. 25, 26.] The greater part of these signs are peculiar to Luke. ἀπορία ἤχους, despair on account of the noise—so Herodian (see Mey.) iv. 14. 1, ἐν ἀπορίᾳ . . . τοῦ πρακτιῶν. Peculiar to Luke. ³⁴—³⁶.] ³⁴ αὐτοῖς and ὑμῶν are emphatic, recalling the thoughts to themselves, after the recounting of these outward signs. ³⁵.] There is meaning in καθῆμ.—sitting securely.

³⁶.] σταθ., to be set, i.e. by the angels—see Matt. ver. 31—before the glorified Son of Man.

³⁷, ³⁸.] Peculiar to Luke. These verses close the scene of our Lord's discourses in Jerusalem which began ch. xx. 1. It does not appear, as Meyer will have it, that Luke believed our Lord to have taught after this in the temple. Nothing is said to imply it—a general closing formula like this applies to what has been related.

³⁸.] ὠρθρ. is literal,—not figurative, 'came eagerly,' as De Wette, &c. think, from several places in the LXX. There is no occasion for a figure here.

Luke relates nothing of any visits to Bethany. He has the name, incidentally only, in ch. xix. 29 and ch. xxiv. 50, where see note.

On the whole question regarding the history of the woman taken in adultery (see digest), compare notes, John viii. 1 ff.

CHAP. XXII. 1, 2.] CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO KILL JESUS. Matt. xxvi. 1—5. Mark xiv. 1, 2. The account of Matt. is the fullest;—see notes there. The words here give us a mere compendium of what took place.

3—6.] COMPACT OF JUDAS WITH THEM TO BETRAY HIM. Matt. xxvi. 14—16. Mark xiv. 10, 11. Our account is strikingly peculiar and independent of the others. The expression ελεῖν. διὰ σαρ. is found in John xiii. 27,—and certainly in its proper place. Satan had not yet entered into Judas,—only (John xiii. 2) put it into his heart to betray our Lord.

4.] καὶ τοῖς στρατηγοῖς is peculiar to Luke: the others have merely the chief priests. On σπαρ., see

Acts iv. 1. The Levitical guard of the temple would be consulted, because it had been of late especially in the temple that our Lord had become obnoxious to them (see ver. 53 and ch. xxi. 37, 38). The words συνεθ. and εξωμολ. here seem clearly to imply that the money was not now paid, but afterwards, when the treachery was accomplished;—see note on Matt. xxvi. 15. ἀτερ οχλ. = παραμόνας, Theophyl., or perhaps χωρὶς θερόβου, Euthym.

7—14.] PREPARATION FOR CELEBRATING THE PASSOVER. Matt. xxvi. 17—19. Mark xiv. 12—16. Our account is the fullest of the three, related however nearly to Mark's. ἦλθεν is not 'approinquabat,' but 'venit.'—On this whole subject see notes on Matt. xxvi. 17, and

John xviii. 28. ἡ ὥρα, the legal time of the Passover being sacrificed. So the narrators in the three Gospels evidently intend. 8.] It was a solemn message, and for it were chosen the two chief Apostles. In the report of Matthew,
 the suggestion is represented as coming from the disciples themselves. The question, ποῦ θέλει was asked, but only in reply to the command of our Lord.
 10.] There can, I think, be no question that this direction was given in superhuman foresight, just as that in ch. xix.
 30:—see also 1 Sam. x. 2—8, and Matt.
 xvii. 27. This person carrying water would probably be a slave, and the time, towards evening, the usual hour of fetching in water. 11.] The οἰκοδεσπ.
 was a man of some wealth, and could not be identical with the water-carrier (see notes on Matt.). κατέλει is not here set apart at this season of the feast, by residents in Jerusalem, in which parties coming from the country might eat the Passover. The question therefore would be well understood;—and the room being εστρωμένον, and as Mark adds, ἵτοιμον, would be no matter of surprise.

 14.] The ὥρα was evening, see above on
 ver. 10, and Matt. xxvi. 20.
 15—18.] Peculiar to Luke. The desire of our Lord to eat this His last Passover may be explained from ch. xii. 50: not merely from his depth of love for His disciples, though this formed an element in it,
 —see John xiii. 1 sq. The γὰρ in ver. 16 gives us the leading reason. παθεῖν
 This is the only instance in the Gospels, of the absolute use of πᾶσχω, as in the Creed, 'He suffered.' We have several times πολλά παθεῖν, ch. ix. 22; xvii. 25; Matt. xvi. 21 al. ταῦτα παθεῖν, ch. xxiv.
 26, and οὕτως παθεῖν ditto ver. 46.
 16.] The full meaning of this declaration is to be sought in the words τοῦτο τὸ πᾶσχα.

Here follows, in Matt. ver. 29, Mark ver. 25, a second declaration, respecting not drinking any more of this fruit of the vine.

21—23.] ANNOUNCEMENT OF A BETRAYER. See notes on Matt. xvi. 20—25. I would not venture absolutely to maintain that this announcement is identical with that one; but I own the arguments of Stier and others to prove them distinct, fail to convince me. The expression πλὴν ἰδοὺ bears marks of verbal accuracy, and inclines us to believe that this announcement was made after the institution of the cup, as here related. 'Notwithstanding this My declaration of love, in giving My Body and Blood for you, there is one here present who shall betray Me.'

ἐπὶ τ. τρ.] viz. in dipping into the dish with the Lord. πορεύεται] A somewhat similar πορεύεσθαι to this occurs ch. xiii. 33; but that is used of our Lord's ministerial progress; this of His progress through suffering to glory.

24—30.] DISPUTE FOR PRE-EMINENCE. OUR LORD'S REPLY. Without attempting to decide the question whether this incident is strictly narrated in order of time, or identical with one of those strifes on this point related Matt. xviii. 1, xx. 20, I will offer one or two remarks on it as it

here stands. (1) Its having happened at this time is not altogether unaccountable. They had been just enquiring among themselves (ver. 23), who among them should do this thing. May it not reasonably be supposed, that some of them (Judas at least) would be anxiously employed in self-justification, and that this would lead, in some part of the table, to a dispute of the kind here introduced? The natural effect of the Lord's rebuke would be to give rise to a different spirit among them, and the question, "Lord, is it I?" may have been the offspring of this better mind;—but see note on Matt. vv. 20—25. (2) It is surprising to find the very declaration of our Lord on the former strife related in this Gospel (ch. ix. 46—48), repeated as having been made at this Paschal meal,—by John, xiii. 20. May not this lead us to suppose that there has been a transposition of some of the circumstances regarding these various contentions among the Apostles, and that these words occurring in John may possibly point to a strife of this kind? (3) The ἐγὼ εἰμι ἐν μίῳ ὑμῶν ὡς ὁ διακονῶν is too clear an allusion to the washing of their feet by the Lord, to have escaped even those Commentators who are slow to discern such hints (e. g. De Wette). The appeal, if it had taken place, is natural and intelligible; but not otherwise. (4) The diction is repeatedly allusive to their employment: ἀνακείμενος—διαριθμεῖσθαι—ἰσθῆναι καὶ πίνειν—ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ μου—all these have reference to things present, or words spoken, during that meal.—

²⁵.] See on Matt. xx. 25. The expression here of ἐξ. αὐτ. ἐν. καλ. also seems to be connected with what had just taken place. 'Among them, the ἐνεργεῖται are those who ἔξουσιάζουσιν αὐτῶν—but among you, I, your ἐνεργεῖτης (see vv. 19, 20, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, bis), do not so, but am in the midst of you as your servant.' ³¹—³⁴.] APPEAL TO PETER: HIS CONFIDENCE, AND OUR LORD'S REPLY. (See Matt. xxvi. 30—35: Mark xiv. 26—31: John xiii. 36—38.) The speech appears to proceed continuously. There are caesurae in these words of our Lord, of close connexion with what has gone before. His way which the Father διέθετο to Him, is to His kingdom—but it is through πειρασμοί. To these, who have been with Him in these trials, He διατίθεται βασιλείαν,—but His way to it must be their way, and here is the πειρασμός,—the sifting as wheat. The sudden address to Simon may perhaps have been occasioned by some remark of his,—or, which I think more probable, may have been made in consequence of some part taken by him in the preceding strife for precedence. Such sudden and earnest addresses spring forth from deep love and concern awakened for another.

31. ἐδεήθῃ.] not only 'hath desired to have you,' E.V., but hath obtained you;—'his desire is granted.' ὑμᾶς—all. This must include Judas, though it does not follow that he was present—the sifting separated the chaff from the wheat, which chaff he was, see Amos ix. 9.

32. ἐγὼ δὲ ὁ σῖς. τ. σου] As Peter was the foremost (the rest are here addressed through him), so he was in the greatest danger. It must not be supposed that our Lord's prayer was not heard, because Peter's faith did fail, in his denial; ἐκλίωη implies a total extinction which Peter's faith did not suffer.

Though the ὑμᾶς included Judas, he is not included in the prayer;—see John xvii. 6—12. We may notice here, that our Lord speaks of the total failure of even an Apostle's faith, as possible.

ἐπιστρέψας] There can, I think, be little doubt that this word is here used in the general N. T. sense, of returning as a penitent after sin, turning to God; and not in the almost expletive meaning which it has in such passages as Ps. lxxiv. 6, ὁ θεός, σὺ ἐπιστρέψας ζωώσεις ὑμᾶς (although even here it may have a somewhat similar sense to the above—see Joel ii. 14: Acts vii. 42).

στήριζον] The use of this word and the cognate substantive thrice by Peter in his two epistles (see ref.), and in the first passage in a connexion with the mention of Satan's temptations, is remarkable.

33, 34.]

Whether these words are in close connexion with the preceding, may I think be doubted. They may represent the same reply of our Lord as we have recorded in John xiii. 38. One thing seems clear, without any attempt at minutely harmonizing: that two announcements were made by our Lord to Peter of his future denial, occasioned by two very different professions of his. One, —during the last meal, i. e. before going out, and occasioned by Peter's professed readiness to go to prison and to death (= to lay down his life) for and with the Lord:—the other,—on the way to the Mount of Olives, after the declaration that all should be offended, and occasioned by Peter's profession that though all should be offended, yet would not he. Nothing is more natural or common than the repetition, by the warm-hearted and ardent, of professions like these, in spite of warning:—and when De Wette calls such an interpretation 'eine Nothhülfe,' all that we can say is, to disclaim any wish to clear up difficulties, except by going into their depths and examining them honestly and diligently. If the above view be correct, I conceive that the account in John of this profession and our Lord's answer, being in strict coherence, and arising out of the subject of conversation, must be taken as the exact one: and Luke must be supposed to have inserted them here without being aware of the intermediate remarks which led to them.

This is the only place in the Gospels where our Lord addresses Peter by the name Πέτρος. And it is remarkable as occurring in the very place where He forewarns him of his approaching denial of Himself.

35—38.] FOREWARNING OF PERILS AT HAND. Peculiar to Luke. The meaning of our Lord in this much controverted passage appears to be, to forewarn the Apostles of the outward dangers which will await them henceforward in their mission:—unlike the time when He sent them forth without earthly appliances, upheld by His special Providence, they must now make use of common resources for sustenance, yea and even of the sword itself for defence. This they misunderstand, and point to the two swords which they have,—for which they are rebuked (see below). 35.] See ch. ix. 3; x. 4; also Matt. x. 9. 36.] αἶψιν was the very word used in the prohibition before. There is a question what should be supplied after μὴ ἔχων. Very many authorities make μάχαιρα understood (as in E. V.);—but the simpler construction and better sense is to place μὴ ἔχων in contrast with ἔχων, He who has a purse, &c., and he who has none, let him &c., see ref. Thus the sense will be complete—for he who has a purse, can buy a sword, without selling his garment. μάχαιρα must be here used in the sense of a sword,—compare ver. 49:—and not a knife to eat with, which some have understood. The ‘sword of the Spirit’ (Olshausen and others) is wholly out of the question. The saying is both a description to them of their altered situation with reference to the world without, and a declaration that self-defence and self-provision would henceforward be necessary. It forms a decisive testimony, from the mouth of the Lord Himself, against the views of the Quakers and some other sects on these points. But it does not warrant aggression by Christians, nor, as some R. Catholics (see the bull “Unam sanctam” of Boniface VIII., cited in Wordsw. ad loc.), spreading the Gospel by the sword.

37.] The connexion is this: ‘your situation among men will be one of neglect and even of danger;—for I myself (see Matt. x. 24, 25) am about to be reckoned among transgressors.’ By the very form of the expression it is evident, that the sword alluded to could have no reference to that night’s danger, or the defending Him from it. τὸ περὶ τοῦ τέλους ἔχει] The prophecy cited closes the section of Isaiah, which eminently predicts the Lord’s sufferings (ch. lii. 13—liii. 12). τὸ περὶ ἐμοῦ—supply γεγραμμίνον, or perhaps more generally, ‘determined in the counsel of God.’

τέλος ἔχει does not merely mean ‘must be fulfilled,’ which would be an assertion without any special reference here—but (as E. V.) have an end;—are coming to the completion of their accomplishment.

So τετελεσται, John xix. 30. ^{38.}
 Two of them were armed,—either from excess of zeal to defend Him, excited by His announcement of His sufferings during this feast,—or perhaps because they had brought their weapons from Galilee as protection by the way. The road from Jericho to Jerusalem (see ch. x. 30) was much infested with robbers;—and it was the custom for the priests, and even the quiet and ascetic Essenes, to carry weapons when travelling. Chrysostom (Hom. in Matt. lxxxiv. p. 797) gives a curious explanation of the two swords: εἰς τὸν οὐν καὶ μαχαίρας εἶναι καὶ διὰ τὸ ἀρνίον.
 This certainly agrees with the number of the disciples sent to get ready the Passover: but it has nothing else to recommend it. They exhibit their swords, misunderstanding His words and supposing them to apply to that night. Our Lord breaks off the matter with ικανόν εστιν,—
 'It is enough;' not 'they are sufficient';
 —but, It is well,—we are sufficiently provided—'it was not to this that My words referred.' The rebuke is parallel with, though milder than, the one in Mark viii. 17,—as the misunderstanding was somewhat similar.

&c. ver. 28. What views of the discourses of our Lord must such an expositor have! —πληρ. καιροί εθν.—Who could suppose that καιροί εθνών should have been interpreted (by Meyer) the appointed time until the Gentiles shall have finished this judgment of wrath—to be ended by the παρουσία, within the lifetime of the hearers? The καιρ. εθν. (see ref.) are the end of the Gentile dispensation,—just as the καιρός of Jerusalem was the end, fulfilment, of the Jewish dispensation.—the great rejection of the Lord by the Gentile world, answering to its type, His rejection by the Jews, being finished, the καιρός shall come, of which the destruction of Jerusalem was a type, καιροί = καιρός: no essential difference is to be insisted on. It is plural, because the εθνη are plural: each Gentile people having in turn its καιρός. 25, 26.] The greater part of these signs are peculiar to Luke. άπορία ηχους, despair on account of the noise—so Herodian (see Mey.) iv. 14. 1, εν άπορία του πρακτιου. ^{34—36}.] Peculiar to Luke. ἑαυτοῖς καὶ ὑμῶν are emphatic, recalling the thoughts to themselves, after the recounting of these outward signs. ³⁵.] There is meaning in καθημ.,—sitting securely.

³⁶.] σταθ., to be set, i. e. by the angels—see Matt. ver. 31—before the glorified Son of Man.

^{37, 38}.] Peculiar to Luke. These verses close the scene of our Lord's discourses in Jerusalem which began ch. xx. 1. It does not appear, as Meyer will have it, that Luke believed our Lord to have taught after this in the temple. Nothing is said to imply it—a general closing formula like this applies to what has been related.

³⁸.] ὥρῳ. is literal,—not figurative, 'came eagerly,' as De Wette, &c. think, from several places in the LXX. There is no occasion for a figure here.

Luke relates nothing of any visits to Bethany. He has the name, incidentally only, in ch. xix. 29 and ch. xxiv. 50, where see note.

On the whole question regarding the history of the woman taken in adultery (see digest), compare notes, John viii. 1 ff.

CHAP. XXII. 1, 2.] CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO KILL JESUS. Matt. xxvi. 1—5. Mark xiv. 1, 2. The account of Matt. is the fullest;—see notes there. The words here give us a mere compendium of what took place.

John xviii. 28. ἡ ὥρα, the legal time of the Passover being sacrificed. So the narrators in the three Gospels evidently intend.

8.] It was a solemn message, and for it were chosen the two chief Apostles. In the report of Matthew, the suggestion is represented as coming from the disciples themselves. The question, ποῦ θέλ. was asked, but only in reply to the command of our Lord.

10.] There can, I think, be no question that this direction was given in superhuman foresight, just as that in ch. xix. 30:—see also 1 Sam. x. 2—8, and Matt. xvii. 27. This person carrying water would probably be a slave, and the time, towards evening, the usual hour of fetching in water.

11.] The οἰκοδεσπ. was a man of some wealth, and could not be identical with the water-carrier (see notes on Matt.). κατάλ. is not here, as in ch. ii. 7, an inn, but a room set apart at this season of the feast, by residents in Jerusalem, in which parties coming from the country might eat the Passover. The question therefore would be well understood;—and the room being well understood;—and the room being εστρωμένον, and as Mark adds, ἡτοίμων, would be no matter of surprise.

14.] The ὥρα was evening, see above on ver. 10, and Matt. xxvi. 20.

15—18.] Peculiar to Luke. The desire of our Lord to eat this His last Passover may be explained from ch. xii. 50: not merely from his depth of love for His disciples, though this formed an element in it,—see John xiii. 1 sq. The γὰρ in ver. 16 gives us the leading reason. παθεῖν]

This is the only instance in the Gospels, of the absolute use of πάσχα, as in the Creed, 'He suffered.' We have several times πολλά παθεῖν, ch. ix. 22; xvii. 25; Matt. xvi. 21 al. ταῦτα παθεῖν, ch. xxiv. 26, and ὁπως παθεῖν ditto ver. 46.

16.] The full meaning of this declaration is to be sought in the words τοῦτο τὸ πάσχα.

ἐκχυννόμενον] These words cannot be said of ποτήριον, 'nam poculum plenum non effunditur, sed bibitur' (Bengel), but are said πρὸς τὸ σπαιρόμενον, which is the wine poured out from the grapes (τὸ γίννημα τῆς ἀμπίλου) and represents the Blood poured out from the Lord's Body. Here follows, in Matt. ver. 29, Mark ver. 25, a second declaration, respecting not drinking any more of this fruit of the vine.

21—23.] ANNOUNCEMENT OF A BETRAYER. See notes on Matt. xvi. 20—25. I would not venture absolutely to maintain that this announcement is identical with that one; but I own the arguments of Stier and others to prove them distinct, fail to convince me. The expression πλὴν ἰδοὺ bears marks of verbal accuracy, and inclines us to believe that this announcement was made after the institution of the cup, as here related. 'Notwithstanding this My declaration of love, in giving My Body and Blood for you, there is one here present who shall betray Me.'

ἐπὶ τ. τρ.] viz. in dipping into the dish with the Lord. πορεύεται] A somewhat similar πορεύεσθαι to this occurs ch. xiii. 33; but that is used of our Lord's ministerial progress; this of His progress through suffering to glory.

24—30.] DISPUTE FOR PRE-EMINENCE. OUR LORD'S REPLY. Without attempting to decide the question whether this incident is strictly narrated in order of time, or identical with one of those strifes on this point related Matt. xviii. 1, xx. 20, I will offer one or two remarks on it as it here stands. (1) Its having happened at this time is not altogether unaccountable. They had been just enquiring among themselves (ver. 23), who among them should do this thing. May it not reasonably be supposed, that some of them (Judas at least) would be anxiously employed in self-justification, and that this would lead, in some part of the table, to a dispute of the kind here introduced? The natural effect of the Lord's rebuke would be to give rise to a different spirit among them, and the question, "Lord, is it I?" may have been the offspring of this better mind;—but see note on Matt. vv. 20—25. (2) It is surprising to find the very declaration of our Lord on the former strife related in this Gospel (ch. ix. 46—48), repeated as having been made at this Paschal meal,—by John, xiii. 20. May not this lead us to suppose that there has been a transposition of some of the circumstances regarding these various contentions among the Apostles, and that these words occurring in John may possibly point to a strife of this kind? (3) The ἰὼ ἡμῶν ἐν μίσῳ ὑμῶν ὡς ὁ διακονῶν is too clear an allusion to the washing of their feet by the Lord, to have escaped even those Commentators who are slow to discern such hints (e. g. De Wette). The appeal, if it had taken place, is natural and intelligible; but not otherwise. (4) The diction is repeatedly allusive to their then employment: ἀνακείμενος—διατίθεμαι—ισθεὶν καὶ πίνειν—ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ μου—all these have reference to things present, or words spoken, during that meal.—

I therefore infer that the strife did happen at this time, in the order related here.

25.] See on Matt. xx. 25. The expression here of εἰς αὐτ. εὐ. καλ. also seems to be connected with what had just taken place. 'Among them, the εὐεργίται are those who ἐξουσιάζουσιν αὐτῶν—but among you, I, your εὐεργίτης (see vv. 19, 20, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, bis), do not so, but am in the midst of you as your servant.' Ptolemy εὐεργίτης at once occurs to us;—numerous other examples are given by Wetstein.

31—34.] APPEAL TO PETER: HIS CONFIDENCE, AND OUR LORD'S REPLY. (See Matt. xxvi. 30—35: Mark xiv. 26—31: John xiii. 36—38.) The speech appears to proceed continuously. There are marks in these words of our Lord, of close connexion with what has gone before. His way which the Father διέθετο to Him, is to His kingdom—but it is through πειρασμοί. To these, who have been with Him in these trials, He διατίθεται βασιλειαν,—but His way to it must be their way, and here is the πειρασμός,—the sifting as wheat. The sudden address to Simon may perhaps have been occasioned by some remark of his,—or, which I think more probable, may have been made in consequence of some part taken by him in the preceding strife for precedence. Such sudden and earnest addresses spring forth from deep love and concern awakened for another.

31. ἐξηγή.] not only 'hath desired to have you,' E. V., but hath obtained you;—'his desire is granted.'

ὑμᾶς—all. This must include Judas, though it does not follow that he was present—the sifting separated the chaff from the wheat, which chaff he was, see Amos ix. 9.

32. ἐγὼ δὲ ὁ. As Peter was the foremost (the rest are here addressed through him), so he was in the greatest danger. It must not be supposed that our Lord's prayer was not heard, because Peter's faith did fail, in his denial; ἐκλείπει implies a total extinction which Peter's faith did not suffer.

Though the ὑμᾶς included Judas, he is not included in the prayer;—see John xvii. 6—12. We may notice here, that our Lord speaks of the total failure of even an Apostle's faith, as possible.

ἐπιστρέψας] There can, I think, be little doubt that this word is here used in the general N. T. sense, of returning as a penitent after sin, turning to God; and not in the almost expletive meaning which it has in such passages as Ps. lxxiv. 6, ὁ θεός, σὺ ἐπιστρέψας ζωώσεις ἡμᾶς (although even here it may have a somewhat similar sense to the above—see Joel ii. 14: Acts vii. 42).

στηρίσῃ] The use of this word and the cognate substantive thrice by Peter in his two epistles (see reff.), and in the first passage in a connexion with the mention of Satan's temptations, is remarkable. 33, 34.]

Whether these words are in close connexion with the preceding, may I think be doubted. They may represent the same reply of our Lord as we have recorded in John xiii. 38. One thing seems clear, without any attempt at minutely harmonizing: that two announcements were made by our Lord to Peter of his future denial, occasioned by two very different professions of his. One, —during the last meal, i. e. before going out, and occasioned by Peter's professed readiness to go to prison and to death (= to lay down his life) for and with the Lord:—the other,—on the way to the Mount of Olives, after the declaration that all should be offended, and occasioned by Peter's profession that though all should be offended, yet would not he. Nothing is more natural or common than the repetition, by the warm-hearted and ardent, of professions like these, in spite of warning:—and when De Wette calls such an interpretation 'eine Nothhülfe,' all that we can say is, to disclaim any wish to clear up difficulties, except by going into their depths and examining them honestly and diligently. If the above view be correct, I conceive that the account in John of this profession and our Lord's answer, being in strict coherence, and arising out of the subject of conversation, must be taken as the exact one: and Luke must be supposed to have inserted them here without being aware of the intermediate remarks which led to them.

This is the only place in the Gospels where our Lord addresses Peter by the name Πέτρος. And it is remarkable as occurring in the very place where He forewarns him of his approaching denial of Himself.

35—38.] FOREWARNING OF PERILS AT HAND. Peculiar to Luke. The meaning of our Lord in this much controverted passage appears to be, to forewarn the Apostles of the outward dangers which will await them henceforward in their mission:—unlike the time when He sent them forth without earthly appliances, upheld by His special Providence, they must now make use of common resources for sustenance, yea and even of the sword itself for defence. This they misunderstand, and point to the two swords which they have,—for which they are rebuked (see below). 35.] See ch. ix. 3; x. 4; also Matt. x. 9.

36.] ἀρειν was the very word used in the prohibition before. There is a question what should be supplied after μη ἔχων. Very many authorities make μάχαιραν understood (as in E. V.);—but the simpler construction and better sense is to place μη ἔχων in contrast with ἔχων, He who has a purse, &c., and he who has none, let him &c., see reff. Thus the sense will be complete—for he who has a purse, can buy a sword, without selling his garment.

μάχαιρα must be here used in the sense of a sword,—compare ver. 49:—and not a knife to eat with, which some have understood. The 'sword of the Spirit' (Olshausen and others) is wholly out of the question. The saying is both a description to them of their altered situation with reference to the world without, and a declaration that self-defence and self-provision would henceforward be necessary. It forms a decisive testimony, from the mouth of the Lord Himself, against the views of the Quakers and some other sects on these points. But it does not warrant aggression by Christians, nor, as some R. Catholics (see the bull "Unam sanctam" of Boniface VIII., cited in Wordsw. ad loc.), spreading the Gospel by the sword.

37.] The connexion is this: 'your situation among men will be one of neglect and even of danger;—for I myself (see Matt. x. 24, 25) am about to be reckoned among transgressors.' By the very form of the expression it is evident, that the sword alluded to could have no reference to that night's danger, or the defending Him from it.

τὸ περὶ τοῦ τέλους ἔχει.] The prophecy cited closes the section of Isaiah, which eminently predicts the Lord's sufferings (ch. lii. 13—liii. 12).

τὸ περὶ αὐτοῦ—supply γεγραμμένον, or perhaps more generally, 'determined in the counsel of God.'

τέλος ἔχει does not merely mean 'must be fulfilled,' which would be an assertion without any special reference here—but (as E. V.) have an end;—are coming to the completion of their accomplishment.

So τετλεισται, John xix. 30. ³⁸.] Two of them were armed,—either from excess of zeal to defend Him, excited by His announcement of His sufferings during this feast,—or perhaps because they had brought their weapons from Galilee as protection by the way. The road from Jericho to Jerusalem (see ch. x. 30) was much infested with robbers;—and it was the custom for the priests, and even the quiet and ascetic Essenes, to carry weapons when travelling. Chrysostom (Hom. in Matt. lxxiv. p. 797) gives a curious explanation of the two swords: εἰς δὲ οὖν καὶ μαχαίρας εἶναι ἐκτὶ διὰ τὸ ἀρνίον. This certainly agrees with the number of the disciples sent to get ready the Passover: but it has nothing else to recommend it. They exhibit their swords, misunderstanding His words and supposing them to apply to that night. Our Lord breaks off the matter with ἱκανόν ἐστιν,—‘It is enough;’ not ‘they are sufficient;’—but, It is well,—we are sufficiently are collected in the digest. With the early and weighty evidence there cited in favour of the passage, it is impossible that it should have been an apocryphal insertion. It was perhaps, as Epiph. states of ἐκλαυσε, expunged by the orthodox, who imagined they found in it an inconsistency with the divine nature of our Lord. We have reason to be thankful, that orthodoxy has been better understood since. The strengthening by means of the angel is physical—and the appearance likewise. See an interesting reply to the scoffs of Julian on this point, in Theodore of Mopsuestia, in loc. ed. Migne, p. 723. It is strange how Olshausen can have so far deceived himself as to imagine that ὥσθι αὐτῷ can imply a merely inward and spiritual accession of strength from above. It is strange likewise that the analogy of the ministration of angels in the Lord's former temptation should not have occurred to those modern Commentators who have objected to this circumstance as improbable. This strengthening probably took place between the first and the second prayer;— and the effect of it is the ἐκτενέστερον προσήνυχο of ver. 44, and the entire resignation expressed in the second and third prayer of Matthew's narrative.

44.] The intention of the Evangelist seems clearly to be, to convey the idea that the sweat was (not fell like, but was) like drops of blood;—i. e. coloured with blood,—for so I understand the ὡς εἰ, as just distinguishing the drops highly coloured with blood, from pure blood. Aristotle, speaking of certain morbid states of the blood, says, ἐκφυραίνοντες δὲ λίαν νοσοῦσιν γίνεσθαι γὰρ ἰχωροεῖδες, καὶ διορροῦνται, οὕτως ὥστε ἥδη τινὲς ὕδατος αἱματώδης ἰδρῶτα, Hist. Anim. iii. 19. To suppose that it only fell like drops of blood (why not drops of any thing else? and drops of blood from what, and where?) is to nullify the force of the sentence, and make the insertion of αἵματος not only superfluous but absurd. We must not forget, in asking on what testimony this rests, that the marks of such drops would be visible after the termination of the agony. An interesting example of a sweat of blood under circumstances of

Mark xiv. 43—52. John xviii. 2—11. Our narrative is here distinguished even more than before by minute and striking details (see on the whole the notes to Matt.). The first of these is the address to Judas ver. 48, calling the traitor by name, and setting before him the whole magnitude of his crime in the very words in which the treason had lately (Matt. ver. 45: Mark ver. 41) and so often (Matt. xxvi. 2; xx. 18; xvii. 22) been announced. Another is in ver.

ask Κύριε, εἰ πατάξῃ ἐν μαχαίρῃ; which question refers to, and is the filling up of their misunderstanding of our Lord in ver. 38.

Again ver. 51 is peculiar to Luke. ⁵¹] ἴατε ὡς τούτου I understand as addressed, not to the disciples, but to the multitude, or rather to those who were holding Him;—His hands were held,—and He says, Suffer, permit me, thus far: i. e. to touch the ear of the wounded person. If this interpretation be correct, it furnishes an additional token of the truthfulness of our narrative—for the previous laying hold of Jesus has not been mentioned here, but in Matthew (ver. 50) and Mark (ver. 46).

⁵³.] There is an important addition here to the other reports of our Lord's speech;—ἀλλὰ . . . σκότους. It stands here instead of the declaration that this was done that the Scriptures might be fulfilled (Matt. ver. 56. Mark ver. 46). The inner sense of those words is indeed implied here—but we cannot venture to say that our report is of the same saying.

Our Lord here distinguishes between the power exercised over Him by men, and that by the Evil One:—but so as to make the ἰξουσία which rules over them to be that of darkness—while His own assertion of this shews that all was by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. In the word σκότος there is also an allusion to the time—midnight. Compare with this declaration of the power of darkness over Him, the declaration, in ch. iv. 13, that the devil left Him ἄχρι καιροῦ.

⁵⁴.] Matt. xxvi. 57. Mark xiv. 53. John xviii. 13. Our narrative leaves it undecided who this high-priest was,—inasmuch as, ch. iii. 2, Annas and Caiaphas are mentioned as high-priests. From John we find that it was Annas; who having questioned Jesus, sent Him bound to Caiaphas, before whom His trial took place. Luke omits this trial altogether—or perhaps gives the substance of it in the

been given from a considerable distance.
 We need not enquire, how our Lord could hear what was going on round the fire in the court, as some Commentators have done. But even were such an enquiry necessary, I see no difficulty in answering it. The anathemas of Peter, spoken to audible? But our Lord needed not these to attract His attention.

mocking before the trial in Caiaphas's house, but in the same place as Matt. vv. 67, 68, and Mark ver. 65, viz. after what happened there. The trial he omits altogether, having found no report of it. How those who take this view of Luke's arrangement can yet suppose him to have had Matt. and Mark before him while writing, I am wholly at a loss to conceive.

66—71.] HEARING BEFORE THE COUNCIL. (Probably) Matt. xxvii. 1. Mark xiv. 1. It seems probable that Luke here gives us an account of a second and formal judgment held in the morning. The similarity of the things said at the two hearings may be accounted for by remembering that they were both more or less formal processes in legal courts, one the precognition, the other, the decision, at which the things said before would be likely to be nearly repeated. 66. ὡς ἐγ. ἡμ.] Some trace of a meeting of the Sanhedrim after daylight I believe our Evangelist to have found, see Matt. xxvii. 1—and to have therefore related as then happening, the following account of what really took place at the former meeting.

67.] λέγοντες—but first took place the μαρτυρία referred to in ver. 71; and the person who said this was the high-priest, and with an adjuration, Matt. ver. 63. The ordinary rendering is the most natural and correct: 'If thou art (not if thou be) the Christ, tell us. The others, 'Tell us whether thou be the Christ;' and, 'Art thou the Christ? tell us' (see the question in ver. 49), are forced and unusual.

68.] I believe these words to have been said as a formal protest on the part of our Lord against the spirit and tendency of the question asked Him, before He gives an answer to it: and as such, I regard them as an original and most valuable report.—'It is with no view to examine and believe, that you ask this question: nor, were I to attempt to educe from your own mouths my innocence, would you answer Me [or release Me]. I am well aware of the intention of this question: BUT (πλὴν, Matt. ver. 64) the time is come for the confession to be made:—ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν ε.τ.λ.' 69.] On ἀπὸ τ. v. = ἀπ' ἀπρ, see notes on Matt. καθ. ἐκ δ. τ. θυν. is common to all Three: only Luke adds τοῦ θεοῦ.

had been asked within the praetorium.— a fact of which our narrator is not aware,
 —representing the whole as a continuous conversation in presence of the Jews; see John, ver. 38. We may remark (and on this see Matt., ver. 18: Mark, ver. 10) that Pilate must have known well that a man who had really done that, whereof Jesus was accused, would be no such object of hatred to the Sanhedrim. This knowledge was doubtless accompanied (as the above-cited verses imply) with a previous acquaintance with some of the sayings and doings of Jesus, from which Pilate had probably formed his own opinion that He was no such King as His foes would represent Him. This is now confirmed by His own words (as related by John), and Pilate wishes to dismiss Him, finding no fault in Him. 5.] Possibly they thought of the matter mentioned ch. xiii. 1, in introducing Galillee into their charge. ἐπίσχυ.] they strengthened, redoubled, the charge —or perhaps intransitive, they became urgent.

6—12.] HE IS SENT TO HEROD, AND
 BY HIM RETURNED TO PILATE. Pecliar to Luke; see remarks on ver. 12.
 Pilate, conscious that he must either do the duty of an upright judge and offend the Jews, or sacrifice his duty to his popularity, first attempts to get rid of the matter altogether by sending his prisoner to Herod, on occasion of this word Gali- lee. This was Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa (see ch. iii. 1 and note on Matt. xiv. 1), who had come up to keep the feast.

10), allowed Agrippa to dispose of those λε τῆς αὐτοῦ βασιλείας. 8, 9.] The reason of our Lord's silence is sufficiently shewn, in the account of Herod's feelings at seeing Him. "Noluit Christus miraculis et sermonibus, ut non ad auditorum curiositatem aut propriam jactantiam, ita nec ad suam ipaius a morte liberationem uti." Drusius.

10.] The accusations,
of worldly kingship and of blasphemy,
would probably be here united, as Herod was a Jew, and able to appreciate the latter.

11.] στρατ. are the bodyguard in attendance upon Herod.

ἔσθητα λαμπρ.] Various interpretations:— either purple, as befitting a king,—and why should this not be the very χλαμὺς κοκκινὴ afterwards used by Pilate's soldiers (Matt. xxvii. 21; ἱμάτιον πορφυροῦν, John xix. 2)?—or white, as λαμπρ. is rendered by some (but see note), Acts x. 30.

12.] The cause of the quarrel is uncertain: apparently something concerning Herod's power of jurisdiction, which was conceded by Pilate in this sending Jesus to Him, and again waived by Herod in sending Him back again. From chap.
xiii. 1, Pilate appears to have encroached on that jurisdiction. The remarks of some Commentators about their uniting

in enmity against Christ (so even, recently, Wordsworth), are quite beside the purpose. The present feeling of Pilate was any thing but hostile to the person of Christ; and Herod, by his treatment of Him, shews that he thought Him beneath his judicial notice.

This remission
of Jesus to Herod seems not to have been known to either of the other three Evangelists. It is worthy of notice that they all relate the mocking by the soldiers of Pilate, which Luke omits,—whereas he gives it as taking place before Herod. This is one of the very few cases where the nature of the history shews that both happened.

Let the student ask himself, How could John, if he composed his Gospel with that of Luke before him, have here given us a narrative in which so important a fact as this is not only not related, but absolutely cannot find any place of insertion? Its real place is after John ver.
38;—but obviously nothing was further from the mind of that Evangelist, for he represents Pilate as speaking continually.

In a few points it approaches John very nearly, compare ver. 18 with John ver. 40, also ἵνα ver. 17, with John ver. 39. ὅς ἀντὶ τῆς προκειμένης αὐτῷ χαρᾶς ἐπέμεινον σταυρόν, ἀσχύνης καταφρονήσας. Nor again were His sacred sufferings a mere popular tragedy for street-bewailing; the sinners should weep for themselves, not for Him. ἐφ' ἑαυτὰς . . . καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ τέκνα ὑμῶν—see Matt. ver. 25, where the people called down the vengeance of His blood on themselves καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ τέκνα ὑμῶν. Many of those who now bewailed Him perished in the siege of Jerusalem. Those who now were young wives, would not be more than sixty when (A.D. 70) the city was taken. But to their children more especially belonged the miseries of which the Lord here speaks.

29. [ερχονται ἡμ.] Between this and then would be time for that effectual weeping, which might save both themselves and their children;—see Acts ii. 37, 38,—but of which few availed themselves. These few are remarkably hinted at in the change to the third person, which excludes them—ἐροῦσιν, i. e. not 'men in general,' nor 'My enemies,'—but 'the impenitent among you,—those who weep merely tears of idle sympathy for Me, and none of repentance for themselves;—those who are in Jerusalem and its misery, which My disciples will not be.' On the saying itself, compare the whole of Hosea ix., especially vv. 12—16.

30.] This is cited from the next chapter of Hosea (x. 8). It was partially and primarily accomplished, when multitudes of the Jews towards the end of the siege sought to escape death by hiding themselves in the subterranean passages and sewers under the city . . . οὗς δ' ἐν τοῖς ὑπονόμοις ἀντηρόνουν, καὶ τὸ ἔδαφος ἀναρρήγγοντες ὅσοις μὲν ἐντετύγχανον ἀντιλεόν. εὐρήθησαν δὲ καὶ ἐκεῖ νεκροὶ πλείους δι' ἐχθρῶν, Jos. B. J. vi. 9. 4. But the words are too solemn, and too often used in a more awful connexion, for a further meaning to escape our notice: see Isa. ii. 10, 19, 21, and Rev. vi. 16, where is the striking expression ἀπὸ τῆς ὀργῆς τοῦ Ἀρνίου—of Him who now was the victim about to be offered. And the whole warning—as every other respecting the destruction of Jerusalem—looks through the type to the antitype, the great day of His wrath. Now, ερχονται ἡμέραι—then ἦλθεν ἡ ἡμέρα ἡ μεγάλη τῆς ὀργῆς αὐτοῦ, Rev. vi. 17.

It is interesting to see how often David, who had passed so long in hiding among the rocks of the wilderness from Saul, calls the Lord his Rock (see Ps. xviii. 2, 46; xlii. 9, &c.). They who have this defence, will not need to call on the rocks to hide them.

31.] This verse—the solemn close of our Lord's teaching on earth—compares His own sufferings with that awful judgment which shall in the end overtake sinners, the unrepentant human kind—the dry tree. These things—ταῦτα—were a judgment on sin;—He bore our sins;—He, the vine, the green tree, the fruit-bearing tree,—of Whom His people are the branches,—if He, if they in Him and in themselves, are so treated, so tried with sufferings,—what shall become of them who are cast forth as a branch and are withered? Read 1 Peter iv. 12—18;—ver. 18 is a paraphrase of our text. Theophylact's comment is excellent: εἰ ταῦτα ποιῶσιν ἐν ἡμοῖς ἡγάδαρ καὶ ἀνιθαλεῖ καὶ ἀειζῶν διὰ τὴν θεότητα, τί γινηταὶ ἐν ὑμῖν ἀάδαρποις καὶ πάσης ticulars inserted which appear later in the other gospels.

34.] Spoken apparently during the act of the crucifixion, or immediately that the crosses were set up.
 Now first, in the fullest sense, from the wounds in His Hands and Feet, is His Blood shed, εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν (Matt. xxvi. 28), and He inaugurates His interces-sional office by a prayer for His murderers, —ἄφες αὐτοῖς. This also is a fulfilment of Scripture, Isa. liii. 12;—where the contents of our verses 33, 34 are remarkably pointed out.

His teaching ended at ver. 31.
 His High-Priesthood is now begun. His first three sayings on the Cross are for others: see ver. 43; John xix. 26, 27.

πάτερ] He is the Son of God, and He speaks in the fulness of this covenant relation.—ἐγὼ ἵδεν ὅτι πάντοτε μου ἀκούεις:—it is not merely a prayer—but the prayer of the Great Intercessor, which is always heard. Notice that though on the Cross, there is no alienation, no wrath of condemnation, between the Father and the Son.

ἄφες αὐτοῖς—who are here intended? Doubtless, first and directly, the four soldiers, whose work it had been to crucify Him. The ποιοῦσιν points directly at this: and it is surely a mistake to suppose that they wanted no forgive- ness, because they were merely doing their duty. Stier remarks, "This is only a misleading fallacy, for they were sinners even as others, and their obedient and unsuspecting performance of their duty was not without a sinful pleasure in doing it, or at all events formed part of their entire standing as sinners, included in that sin of the world, to which the Lord here ascribes His Crucifixion" (vi. 408, edn. 2). But not only to them, but to them as the representatives of that sin of the world, does this prayer apply. The nominative to ποιοῦσιν is οἱ ἄνθρωποι— mankind,—the Jewish nation, as the next moving agent in His death,—but all of us, inasmuch as for our sins He was bruised.

οὐ γὰρ οἴδατε τί ποι-
οῦσιν, primarily, as before, spoken of the livered Him up, see John xi. 49, ὅτι

οὐκ οἴδατε ὁδοῖν,—then of all, whose sin is from lack of knowledge of the truth, of perhaps also by the awful answer Matt.

viz. in prophecy, John xi. 49; see also Matt. xxvi. 26,—and on the sin alluded to, Matt. xii. 31; 1 John v. 16. Observe that between the two members of this prayer lies the work of the Spirit leading to repentance—the prayer that they may have their eyes opened, and know what they have done: which is the necessary subjective condition of forgiveness of sins, see 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26.

³⁵.] The insults of the people are by no means excluded, even with σὺν αὐτοῖς omitted:
nay they are implied, by the δὲ καὶ which follows. To find a discrepancy with Matt. and Mark here, is surely unfair (Meyer, De Wette):—the people's standing looking on, does not describe their mind towards Jesus: Luke reports no more than he knew: and the inference may be drawn that those whom he has related to have cried out an hour ago,

'Crucify him,'—would not have stood by in silence. On ver. 48, see note there.

39—42.] Peculiar to Luke. Matthew and Mark have merely a general and less accurate report of the same incident.

All were now mocking; the soldiers, the rulers, the mob:—and the evil-minded thief, perhaps out of bravado before the crowd, puts in his scoff also.

40.] Bengel supports the notion that this penitent thief was a Gentile. But surely this is an unwarranted assumption. What should a Gentile know of Paradise, or of the kingdom of the Messiah as about to come? The silence of the penitent is broken by the ἡμᾶς of the other compromising him in the scoff. οὐδὲ alludes to the multitude—Dost thou too not fear God? εἴτι—(as thou oughtest to do), seeing that . . .

41. ἡμεῖς] He classes himself with the other in condemnation, but not in his prayer afterwards. ἄτοπον, unseemly. This is a remarkable testimony to the innocence of Jesus from one who was probably executed for his share in those very tumults which He was accused of having excited.

42.] The thief had heard of the announcements which Jesus had made,—or at all events of the popular rumour concerning his Kingdom. His faith lays hold on the truth that this is the King of the Jews in a higher and immortal sense. There is nothing so astounding in this man's faith dogmatically considered, as De Wette thinks; he merely joins the common belief of the Jews of a Messianic Kingdom, in which the ancient Fathers were to rise, &c.,—with the conviction, that Jesus is the Messiah. What is really astounding, is the power and strength of that faith, which, amidst shame and pain and mockery, could thus lift itself to the apprehension of the Crucified as this King. This thief would fill a conspicuous place in a list of the triumphs of faith supplementary to Heb. xi. ἐν. v. βας.] The Vulgate, which is followed by Luther,—and the E.V.,—renders this as if it were εις την βασ. (see var. readd.), which is a sad mistake, as it destroys the force of the expression. It is in thy Kingdom—with thy Kingdom, so ἰδοὺ ἐν τῇ δόξῃ αὐτοῦ, Matt. xxv. 31, which we (E.V.) have translated rightly. The above mistake entirely loses ἡδὴ—making it merely ‘camest into’, just as we say to ‘come into’ an estate: whereas it is the chief word in the clause, and ἐν τῇ β. σου its qualification, at Thy coming in Thy Kingdom. It will be seen that there is no necessity for supposing the man to have been a disciple, as some have done.

It is remarkable how, in three following sayings, the Lord appears as Prophet, Priest, and King: as Prophet, to the daughters of Jerusalem;—as Priest, interceding for forgiveness;—as King, acknowledged by the penitent thief, and answering his prayer. 43. Ἀμήν σοι λ. . . .] The Lord surpasses his prayer in the answer; the ἀμήν σοι λέγω, σήμερον, is the reply to the uncertain ὅταν of the thief.

σήμερον] This day: before the close of this natural day. The attempt to join it with σοι λέγω, considering that it not only violates common sense, but destroys the force of our Lord’s promise, is surely something worse than silly; see below. μετ' ἐμοῦ ἔσῃ—

can bear no other meaning than thou shalt be with Me, in the ordinary sense of the words, ‘I shall be in Paradise, and thou with Me.’ ἐν τῷ παρ.] On these words rests the whole exegesis of the saying. What is this PARADISE? The word is used of the garden of Eden by the LXX, Gen. ii. 8, &c., and subsequently became, in the Jewish theology, the name for that part of Hades, the abode of the dead, where the souls of the righteous await the resurrection. It was also the name for a supernal or heavenly abode, see ref. N. T. The former of these is, I believe, here primarily to be understood;—but only as introductory, and that immediately, to the latter. By the death of Christ only was Paradise first opened, in the true sense of the word. He Himself, when speaking of Lazarus (ch. xvi. 22), does not place him in Paradise, but in Abraham’s bosom—in that place which the Jews called Paradise, but by an anticipation which our Lord did not sanction. I believe the matter to have been thus. Our Lord spoke (as Grotius has remarked) to the thief so as He knew the thief would understand Him; but He spoke with a fuller and more blessed meaning than he could understand then. For that day, on that very evening, was ‘Paradise’ truly ‘regained’—opened by the death of Christ. We know (1 Pet. iii. 18, 19, where see note; iv. 6) that our Lord went down into the depths of death,—announced His triumph—(for His death was His triumph) to the imprisoned spirits,—and in that moment—for change of state, to the disembodied, is all that change of place implies—they perhaps were in the Paradise of God,—in the blessed heavenly place, implied by the word, 2 Cor. xii. That this is not fullness of glory as yet, is evident;—for the glorified body is not yet joined to their spirits,—they are not yet perfect (Heb. xi. 40); but it is a degree of bliss compared to which their former degree was but as imprisonment.

This work of the Lord I believe to have been accomplished on the instant of His death, and the penitent to have followed Him at his death—some little time after—into the Paradise of God. That our Lord returned to take his glorified Body, was in accordance with His design, and He became thereby the first-fruits of the holy dead, who shall like Him put on the body of the resurrection, and be translated from disembodied and imperfect bliss in the Paradise of God, to the perfection of glorified humanity in His glory, and with Him, not in Paradise, but at God’s right hand. 44–46.] Our account is very short and epitomizing—containing however, peculiar to itself, the last word of our Lord on the cross. The impression conveyed by this account, if we had no other, would be that the veil was rent before the death of Jesus;—but the more detailed account of Matthew corrects this.

45.] The words ἐσκοτ. ὁ ἥλ. are probably added to give solemnity to the preceding, assigning its reason; so that the gloss τοῦ ἥλ. ἐκλείποντος shews a right apprehension of the words. It can hardly be, as Mey., that the earth was darkened till the ninth hour, and then the sun became dark also.

46.] The use of φωνῇ μεγάλῃ shews that this was the cry to which Matt. and Mark allude. The words are from the LXX, varying however from the common reading παραθήσεται, and giving the verb in the present, which is also the rendering of the Hebrew (תִּשְׁבֵּט).

These words have in them an important and deep meaning. They accompany that, which in our Lord's case was strictly speaking the act of death. It was His own act—not 'feeling the approach of death,' as some, not apprehending the matter, have commented; but a determinate delivering up of His spirit to the Father.—παρίδωκεν τὸ πνεῦμα, John: see John x. 18—οὐδὲν αἶρει αὐτὴν ἀπ' ἑμοῦ. ἀλλ' ἐγὼ τίθημι αὐτὴν ἀπ' ἑμευτοῦ. None of the Evangelists say 'He died': although that expression is ever after used of His death stated as one great fact:—but it is, ἀφῆκεν τὸ πν., Matt.; ἐξέπνευσεν, Mk. Luke; παρίδωκεν τὸ πνεῦμα, John.

The πνεῦμα here is the Personality
VOL. I.

—the human soul informed by the Spirit, in union: not separated, so that His soul went to Hades, and His spirit to the Father (Olshausen). Both are delivered into the hand of the Father—by Whom quickened (but ζωοποιθεῖς πνεύματι of 1 Pet. iii. 18 is to be rendered 'quickened in the spirit'—by the Father is understood in ζωοποιθεῖς) He worked His great victory over death and Hell. See again 1 Pet. iii. 18, 19 and notes, and Rom. viii. 10, 11. The latter part of the verse in Ps. xxxi. 'for Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, thou God of truth,' is not applicable here. The whole Psalm is not strictly prophetic, but is applied by the Lord to Himself. 47—49.] Our account, as well as that of Mark, ascribes the impression made on the centurion to that which took place at the death of Jesus,—i. e. οὐδὲν αἶρει ἐξέπνευσεν. Something in the manner and words convinced him that this man was the Son of God; which expression he uses doubtless with reference to what he had before heard, but especially to the words just uttered—"Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." Luke has not so exactly expressed the words,—but the E. V. has wrongly and ungrammatically rendered them, and made 'a righteous man' (Luke)

12.] This verse cannot well be interpolated from John xx., for the only reason for the insertion would be, to tally with ver. 24, and in that case it certainly would not mention Peter alone. That Cleopas says, ver. 24, some of us went, &c. must not be pressed too much, although it does certainly look as if he knew of more than one (see note there). The similarity in diction to John xx. 5, 10 (παρακύβας βλέπει τὰ ὀθόνια κείμενα, and ἀπ᾽ ἧλθεν πρὸς αὐτὸν, being common to the two passages) indicates a common origin, and, if I mistake not, one distinct from the rest of the narrative in this chapter. The meaning of πρὸς αὐτόν, as belonging to ἀπ᾽ ἧλθεν and not to θαυμάζων, is fixed by the expression in John, i. c.

13—35.] JESUS APPEARS TO TWO OF THE DISCIPLES AT EMMANUS. Peculiar to Luke:—the incident (but from another source) is alluded to in the fragmentary addition to Mark xvi. (ver. 12.)

note on Matt. x. 3). Who the other was, is idle to conjecture. Origen, in several places, calls him Simon; apparently from having read ἰδιοντες in ver. 34, and referring ὥσθι r. Σ. to the present appearance. Epiphanius says it was Nathanael; Theophylact, Luke himself. This may shew what such reports are worth. Wieseler (Chron. vol. i. p. 481) believes the two to have been, James the son of Alphæus or Clopas or Cleopas (but see above) journeying with his father, and the appearance on the road to Emmaus to be the same as ὥσθι ἱαρώβι, 1 Cor. xv. 7. Our narrative seems to have been from the report of Cleopas. Ἐμμαούς] Joseph. B. J. vii. 6. 6, mentions this Emmaus as sixty stades from Jerusalem. There were two other places of the same name: (1) a town afterwards called Nicopolis, twenty-two Roman miles from Jerusalem, where Judas Maccabeus defeated the Syrian general Gorgias: see 1 Macc. iii. 40—57. (2) Another Emmaus is mentioned Jos. B. J. iv. 1. 3, πρὸ τῆς Τιβεριάδος—where he adds, μεθρημνησμένη δὲ Ἀμμαούς θιμὰ λίγοι' ἄν, ἵστι γὰρ ἐν αὐτῇ πηγὴ θερμὴν ὑδάτων πρὸς ἀκείνῃ ἐπιτήδειος. This was the case also with the other places of the name. Our Emmaus is now called Cubeibi (?).

15.] καὶ ἐγέν. . . . καὶ . . . , the ordinary construction. The last καὶ does not mean 'also.' αὐτὸς [η.] Jesus Himself, of whom they had been speaking. But this expression forbids the supposition that He was here, strictly speaking, in stricta propria, as we find it less precisely expressed in Mark xvi. 12. The reason why they did not know Him was (ver. 16), that their eyes were supernaturally influenced, so that they could not;—see also ver. 31. No change took place in Him—nor apparently in them, beyond a power upon them, which prevented the recognition just so much as to delay it till aroused by the well-known action and manner of His breaking the bread. The cause of this was the will of the Lord himself, who would not be seen by them till the time when He saw fit. ἐγγίσας—from behind: see ver. 18, where they take Him for an inhabitant of Jerusalem. 17.] He had apparently been walking with them some little time before this was said. ἀντιβάλλαν λόγους implies to dispute with some earnestness: but there is no blame implied in the words. Possibly, though both were sad, they may have taken different views:—and in the answer of Cleopas we have that of the one who was παροικ. (with or without iv, see reff.) in the LXX is to sojourn in—not to dwell in.

19—24.] Stier well remarks, that the Lord here gives us an instructive example how far, in the wisdom of love, we may carry dissimulation, without speaking untruth. (See the citation from Jer. Taylor below, on ver. 29.) He does not assert, that he was one of the strangers at this feast at Jerusalem, nor does He deny that he knew what had been done there in those days, but He puts the question by, with What things?

οἱ δὲ εἶπ. Either, one spoke and the other assented; or perhaps each spoke, sometimes one and sometimes the other;—only we must not break up these verses and allot an imagined portion to each. They contain the substance of what was said, as the reporter of the incident afterwards put it together.

 speaking to a stranger, who (they believed) was not acquainted with any among them, might cause them here to use τινὲς, withbegan with each as He came to them.

τὰ π. αὐτοῦ, the things concerning him, i. e. concerning Jesus of Nazareth, the speaker being regarded as a different person. This has been missed, and αὐτοῦ altered to ταυτοῦ. De Wette remarks, "It were much to be wished that we knew what prophecies of the death and triumph of Jesus are here meant. There are but few that point to the subject." But I take the τὰ περὶ αὐτοῦ to mean something very different from mere prophetical passages. The whole Scriptures are a testimony to Him: the whole history of the chosen people, with its types, and its law, and its prophecies, is a shewing forth of Him: and it was here the whole,—πᾶσαι αἱ γρ.—that He laid out before them. This general leading into the meaning of the whole, as a whole, fulfilled in Him, would be much more opportune to the place, and time occupied, than a direct exposition of selected passages.

The things concerning Him (E. V.) is right: not, 'the parts concerning Him.'

Observe the testimony which this verse gives to the divine authority, and the Christian interpretation, of the O. T. Scriptures: so that the denial of the references to Christ's death and glory in the O. T. is henceforth nothing less than a denial of His own teaching. 29.]

παρεβ., they constrained Him. It is not implied that He said any thing to indicate that He would go further—but simply, that He was passing on. "Our blessed Saviour pretended that He would pass forth beyond Emmaus: but if he intended not to do it, yet He did no injury to the two disciples, for whose good it was that He intended to make this offer: and neither did He prevaricate the strictness of simplicity and sincerity, because they were persons with whom He had made no contracts; to whom He had passed no obligation; and in the nature of the thing, it is proper and natural, by an offer, to give an occasion to another to do a good action: and in case it succeeds not, then to do what we intended not; and so the offer was conditional." Jer. Taylor, Sermon on Christian Simplicity. Works (Heber), vi. 156.

μεθ' ἡμῶν does not imply that they lived at Emmaus; merely in the same quarters with us. 30.] I believe that there was something in the manner of His breaking the bread, and helping and giving it to them, which was his own appointed means of opening their eyes to the recognition of Him. But we must not suppose any reference to, much less any celebration of, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Neither of these disciples was present at its institution (but see Wieseler's conjecture, which is at all events worth consideration, in note on ver. 13); and certainly it had never been celebrated since. With this simple consideration will fall to the ground all that Romanists have built on this incident, even to making it a defence of administration in one kind only. See Wordsw., who gives, in reply, a solution as artificial and unwarranted as the argument of the R. Catholics: shewing the danger of departing from the plain sense of Holy Scripture in search of fanciful allusions. The analogy of such a breaking and giving with His institution of that holy ordinance becomes lost, when we force the incident into an example of the ordinance itself. The Lord at their meal takes on Him the office of the master of the house (which alone would shew that it was not their house, but an inn), perhaps on account of the superior place which His discourse had won for Him in their estimation:—and as the Jewish rule was, that "three eating together were bound to give thanks" (Berac. 45, 1, cited by Meyer), He fulfils this duty. Compare Matt. vii. 29. ἐλάλει ἡμῖν, as Bengel remarks, is more than συνηλάλει ἡμῖν:—He spoke to us, not merely, 'with us,' as E. V.

33.] 'Jam non timent iter nocturnum, quod antea dissuaserant ignoto comiti.' Bengel. The whole eleven were not there—Thomas was not present, if at least the appearance which follows be the same as that in John ix 19, which there seems no reason to doubt. Some have derived an argument from this incompleteness in their number, for the second of the travellers being also an Apostle; see above on ver. 13.

Wh these οἱ σὺν αὐτοῖς are, we learn from Acts i. 14.

34.] This appearance to Simon (i. e. Peter—the other Simon would not be thus named without explanation; see ch. v. 3 ff.) is only hinted at here,—but is asserted again, 1 Cor. xv. 5 in immediate connexion with that which here follows. It is not clear whether it took place before or after that on the way to Emmaus.

35.] And they—the travellers, distinguished from the others—not 'they also,' for thus we should leave the clause without a copula.

ἐν τῇ κλ.] We can hardly after ἐγνώσθη exclude that sense of in, which gives that which follows a share in the instrumentality: being the element, in and by means of which. The example cited by De Wette, ἐν τῇ ἀναστροφῇ, Matt. xxii. 28, for the sense 'during the breaking,' &c. does not apply inasmuch as in that case there is no verb. John xiii. 35 is far more to the point, and almost decides for the other sense. The

this should have been so, does not exclude the supernatural opening of their eyes: see above, on ver. 31.

36—40.] APPEARANCE OF JESUS TO THE DISCIPLES. Mark xvi. 14. John xx. 19—23. The identity of these appearances need hardly be insisted on. On Mark's narrative, see notes there. That of John presents no difficulties, on one supposition,—that he had not seen this of Luke. The particulars related by him are mostly additional, but not altogether so.

36.] ἔσθη ἐν μέσῳ—while they were speaking of these things,—possibly not entirely crediting the account, as seems hinted at in Mark xvi. 13,—the Lord appeared, the doors being shut, in the midst (John xx. 19 and notes). εἰρ. ὑμ., the ordinary Jewish salutation, ἰλκ, ἰλκ, see ch. x. 5, but of more than ordinary meaning in the mouth of the Lord: see John xiv. 27.

38.] διαλογ., not merely 'thoughts,' as E. V., but questionings.

39.] There seems to be some doubt whether the reference to His hands and feet were on account of the marks of the nails, to prove His identity,—or as being the uncovered parts of His body, and to prove His corporeity. Both views seem supported by the text, and I think both were united. The sight of the Hands and Feet, which they recognized as His, might at once convince them of the reality of the appearance, and the identity of the Person. The account of John confirms the idea that He shewed them the marks of the nails, both by His side being added, and by the expressions of Thomas which followed. The same seems also implied in our ver. 40.

The assertion of the Lord must not be taken as representing merely 'the popular notion concerning spirits' (Dr. Burton); He who is the Truth, does not speak thus of that which He knows, and has created. He declares to us the truth, that those appearances to which He was now likened by the disciples, and spirits in general, have not flesh and bones. Observe σάρκα κ. ὀστέα—but not αἷμα. This the resurrection Body probably had not,—as being the animal life:—see notes on John vi. 51, and John ix. 27. 41.] ἀπὸ τῆς χ., from their joy: the joy which they felt. Wetstein quotes Livy, xxxix. 49, vix sibi met ipsi prae necopinato gaudio credentes. 42.] This was done further to convince them of his real corporeity. The omission of the words καὶ . . . κηρίου in the best MSS. is remarkable: see var. readd. It may possibly have arisen from an idea in some transcriber that this meal is the same as that in John xxi. 9. The words could hardly have been an interpolation. 44.] Certainly, from the recurrence of 34, which implies immediate sequence, Luke, at the time of writing his Gospel, was not aware of any Galilean appearances of the Lord, nor indeed of any later than this one. That he corrects this in Acts i., shews him meantime to have become acquainted with some other sources of information, not however perhaps including the Galilean appearances (see Prolegomena to Luke, § iv. 2).

The following discourse apparently contains a summary of many things said during the last forty days before the ascension;—they cannot have been said on this evening;—for after the command in ver. 49, the disciples would not have gone away into Galilee. Whether the Evangelist regarded it as a summary, is to me extremely doubtful. Knowing apparently of no Galilean appearances, he seems to relate the command of ver. 49, both here and in the Acts, as intended to apply to the whole time between the Resurrection and the Ascension. οὗτοι οἱ λ., 'behold the realization of the words,' &c. οὗς δλ.: see ch. xviii. 31—33; xxi. 37; Matt. xxvi. 56 al.; but doubtless He had often said things to them on these matters, which have not been recorded for us. So in John x. 25, we have perhaps a reference to a saying not recorded. This threefold division of the O. T. is the ordinary Jewish one, into the Law (νόμος), Prophets (προφῆται), and Hagiographa (ῥαββιν),—the first containing the Pentateuch;—the second Joshua, Judges, the four books of Kings, and the Prophets, except Daniel;—the third the Psalms, and all the rest of the canonical books:—Daniel, Esther, Ezra, and Nehemiah being reckoned as one book, and the Chronicles closing the canon.

47. ἀρξάμενοι.] See reff. The substance of the preaching of the Gospel literally corresponded to this description—see Acts ii. 38: μετανοήσατε, καὶ βαπτισθῆτω ἕκαστος ὑμῶν ἐν τῷ ὄν. Ἰησοῦ χρ. ἐκ ἁφαισιν ἁμαρτιῶν,—were the words of the first sermon preached at Jerusalem.

48. ὑμεῖς.] From what follows, Acts i. 22, if these words are to be taken in their strict sense, they must have been spoken only to the Apostles;—they may however have been more general, and said to all present. 49.] This promise is explained (Acts i. 5) to be the baptism with the Holy Ghost,—and the time is limited to 'not many days hence.'

ἐν ᾧ ἐξεποσ. The procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son is clearly here declared, as well as that from the Father. And consequently we find Peter, in Acts ii. 33, referring back to these very words, in ascribing the outpouring of the Spirit to the now exalted Saviour. In that verse, the ἐγὼ of this is filled up by τῷ δεξιῷ τοῦ θεοῦ ὑψωθεῖς—the proper supplement of it here also.

The promise itself is not found in the three Gospels, but expressly and frequently in John xiv.—xvi.: see xiv. 16—26; xv. 26; xvi. 7—11, 13, 14.

The present, ἐξαποστέλλω, is not = a future, but implies that the actual work is done, and the state brought in, by which that sending is accomplished;—viz. the giving of the πᾶσα ἐξουσία ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐν τῇ γῆ, Matt. xxviii. 18.

No stress need be laid on καθίστατε: see reff. The word Ἱεροσ. is probably interpolated by some who, believing these words to represent the Galilean discourse, placed it here for an explanation: or perhaps Acts i. 4 gave occasion to it. This command must have been (historically) uttered after the return from Galilee: see above.

ἐνδύσθ. Though the verb is used in the O. T. (see Judg. vi. 34; 2 Chron. xxiv. 20; 1 Chron. xii. 18) of inspiration by the Spirit, it here has its full meaning, of abiding upon and characterizing, as a garment does the person: this, as Stier remarks, was the true and complete clothing of the nakedness of the Fall. 50.] The Ascension appears to be related as taking place after the above words were spoken—but there is an uncertainty and want of specification about the narrative, which forbids us to conclude that it is intended as following immediately upon them. This however can only be said as taking the other Gospels and Acts i. into account:—if we had none but the Gospel of Luke we should certainly say that the Lord ascended after the appearance to the Apostles and others, on the evening of the day of His resurrection. ἐξῆγγ. [ἐξω], i. e. probably, after the words ἐν τῇ πόλει just occurring, outside Jerusalem: as in ref. Mark: but the ἐξω might only apply to the house in which they were, see other reff., and Matt. xxvi. 75.

ἐξω πρὸς B.—not quite to the village itself, but over the brow of the Mount of Olives where it descends on Bethany: see Acts i. 12. (The synonymity of these two expressions may shew that the same is meant, when, Mark xi. 11, our Lord is said to have gone out at night to Bethany, and, Luke xxi. 37, to the Mount of Olives.) 51.] διέστη—not, 'He went a little distance from them previous to His ascension,'—as Meyer would interpret it; but the two verbs belong to one and the same incident,—He was parted from them and borne up into heaven. We need not understand, 'by an angel,' or 'by a cloud,' nor need ἀνέφ. be middle; the absolute passive is best. The tense is imperfect, signifying the continuance of the going up during the προσκυν. of the next verse. The more particular account of the Ascension is given Acts i. 9—12, where see notes. That account is in perfect accordance with this, but supplementary to it. 52. προσκ. This had been done before by the women, Matt. xxviii. 9, and by the disciples on the mountain in Galilee. This however was a more solemn act of worship, now paid to Him as exalted to God's right hand. 53.] διὰ παντός, continually,—not 'all their time;'—daily, at the hours of prayer: see Acts i. 13, 14; iii. 1.

A few words must be appended here on a point which has been much stirred in Germany, even among the more orthodox Commentators; THE HISTORIC REALITY OF THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE ASCENSION. On those among them who doubt the fact of an Ascension at all, I have nothing to say, standing as I do altogether on different ground from them.

*The Lord Himself foretold His Ascension, John vi. 62; xx. 17:—it was immediately after His disappearance from the earth expressly announced by the Apostles, Acts ii. 33, 34; v. 31:—continued to be an article of their preaching and teaching, 1 Pet. iii. 22; Eph. ii. 6; iv. 10; 1 Tim. iii. 16. So far should we have been assured of it, had we not possessed the testimonies of Luke, here and in the Acts:—for the fragment super-added to the Gospel of Mark merely states the fact, not the manner of it. But, to take first the à priori view,—is it probable that our Lord would have left so weighty a fact in His history on earth, without witnesses? And might we not have concluded from the wording of John vi. 62, that our Lord must have intended an ascension in the sight of some of those to whom He spoke, and that the Evangelist himself gives that hint, by recording those words without comment, that he had seen it?* Then again, is there any thing in the bodily state of our Lord after His resurrection which raises any even the least difficulty here? He appeared suddenly, and vanished suddenly, when He pleased:—when it pleased Him, He ate, He spoke, He walked; but his Body was the Body of the Resurrection;—only not yet his σῶμα τῆς δόξης (Phil. iii. 21), because He had not yet assumed that glory: but that He could assume it, and did assume it at his Ascension, will be granted by all who believe in Him as the Son of God. So that it seems, on à priori *grounds, probable that, granted the fact of the Ascension, it did take place in some such manner as our accounts relate:—in the sight of the disciples, and by the uplifting of the risen Body of the Lord towards that which is to those on this earth the visible heaven. This being so, let us now, secondly, regard the matter à posteriori. We possess two accounts of the circumstances of this ascension, written by the same person, and that person a contemporary of the Apostles themselves. Of the genuineness of these accounts there never was a doubt. How improbable that Luke should have related what any Apostles or apostolic persons might have contradicted? How improbable that the universal Church, founded by those who are said to have been eye-witnesses of this event, should have received these two accounts as authentic, if they were not so? That these accounts themselves are never referred to in the Epistles, is surely no argument against them. If an occasion had arisen, such as necessitated the writing of 1 Cor. xv., there can be little doubt that St. Paul would have been as particular in the circumstances of the Ascension, as he has been in those of the Resurrection. The fact is, that by far the greatest difficulty remains to be solved by those who can imagine a myth or fiction on this subject to have arisen in the first age of the Church. Such a supposition is not more repugnant to our Christian faith and reverence, than it is to common sense and historical consistency.*

CHAP. I. 1—18.] Prologue : in which is contained the substance and subject of the whole Gospel. THE ETERNAL WORD OF GOD, THE SOURCE OF ALL EXISTENCE, LIFE, AND LIGHT, BECAME FLESH, DWELT AMONG US, WAS WITNESSED TO BY JOHN, REJECTED BY HIS OWN PEOPLE, BUT RECEIVED BY SOME, WHO HAD POWER GIVEN THEM TO BECOME THE SONS OF GOD. HE WAS THE PERFECTION AND END OF GOD'S REVELATION OF HIMSELF; WHICH WAS PARTIALLY MADE IN THE LAW, BUT FULLY DECLARED IN JESUS CHRIST.

1.] Before commenting on the truths here declared, it is absolutely necessary to discuss the one word on which the whole turns : viz. ὁ λόγος. This term is used by John without explanation, as bearing a meaning well known to his readers. The enquiry concerning that meaning must therefore be conducted on historical, not on mere grammatical grounds. And the most important elements of the enquiry are, (I.) the usage of speech as regards the word, by John himself and other biblical writers : and (II.) the

(a) From the first consideration we find, that in other biblical authors, well as in John, the word is never used to signify the divine Reason or Mind; and indeed those of any human creature. These ideas are expressed by νοῦς καρδία, or νοῦς, or ἡ σοφία τοῦ θεοῦ. the classics the word λόγος never signifies the subjective faculty of reason, but reason to be given, objectively, of a thing or things. The usual Scriptural meaning of λόγος is speech, or ὁ λόγος τοῦ θ. is the creative, declarative injunctive Word of God. (β) That it is also the import in our prologue, manifest, from the evident relation which it bears to the opening of the history of creation in Genesis. ὁ λόγος is not attribute of God, but an acting reality, which the Eternal and Infinite is the great first cause of the created and finite. (γ) Again this λόγος is undoubtedly our prologue, personal:—not an abstraction merely, nor a personification,—nor the speaking word of God, once manifested in the prophets but afterwards fully declared in Christ, as Luther (i. 280 ff.), comparing our prologue with Heb. i. 1,—but a PERSON: for ὁ λόγος ἦν πρὸς τὸν θεόν, and ὁ λόγος σὰρὰ ἐγένετο: also θεὸς ἦν ὁ λόγος, not ὁ ἦν,—which certainly would be said of none but a PERSON. (δ) Moreover, the λόγος is identical with JESUS CHRIST, as the pre-existing Son of God. A comparison of vv. 14 and 15 will place this beyond doubt. (ε) And Jesus Christ is the Word of God, not because He speaks the word (as if ὁ λόγος = ὁ λέγων, which is contrary to all usage, in which it = not ὁ λέγων, but τὸ λεγόμενον);—nor because He is the One promised or spoken of,

= ὁ λεγόμενος,—which is even less according to analogy;—nor because He is the Author and source of the λόγος as spoken in the Scriptures, &c.,—any more than his being called ζωὴ and φῶς implies only that He is the Giver of life and light: but because the Word dwells in and speaks from him, just as the Light dwells in and shines from, and the Life lives in and works from, Him. (ζ) This λόγος which became flesh, is not from, nor of, Time or Space (ch. iii. 31; viii. 58); but eternally pre-existent,—and manifested in Time and Space, for the gracious ends of divine Love in Redemption (ch. iii. 16, 17). (η) This λόγος spoke in the law and prophets, yet partially and imperfectly (ver. 17; ch. v. 39, 46); but in the personal λόγος, spoke forth in fulness of grace and truth. It was He who made the worlds (ver. 3); He, who appeared to Isaiah (Isa. vi. compare ch. xii. 41); He, whose glory is manifested in His power over nature (ch. ii. 11); He, by reception of whom the new birth is wrought (ch. i. 12, 13); who has power over all flesh (ch. xvii. 2),—and can bestow eternal life (ibid.); whose very sufferings were His glory, and the glorifying of God (ch. xvii. 1 al.); and who, after those sufferings, resumed, and now has, the glory which He had with the Father before the world began (ch. xviii. 5, 24).

(θ) Luthardt, in his Commentary on this Gospel, has propounded (vol. i. p. 280 ff.) the following view of the word λόγος and its usage: Jesus Christ is the fulness of that word of God which was fragmentarily manifested in the prophets (Heb. i. 1). But in this prologue, ὁ λόγος is not to be taken as identical with Jesus not yet incarnate, nor is He the subject of vv. 1 ff. And he urges ch. x. 35, 36 (see note there, where I have discussed this) as a key text to the meaning of λόγος. It seems to me, that while much of his view is true and sound, that part of it will not hold which denies the identity of the pre-existent λόγος with Jesus, in the Apostle's mind. Had he intended by the λόγος of vv. 1—4 any other than the personal Son of God who in ver. 14 became flesh, I do not see how ἦν πρὸς τὸν θεόν, and θεὸς ἦν, could be used of ὁ λόγος. Nor again can I consent with him to disconnect the use of λόγος by St. John from its previous history. The reasons given in this note for believing such use, as matter of fact, to have been prepared by the Alexandrine philosophy, are no way affected by the objections which he alleges, the difference between the λόγος of St. John and that of Philo, and the corrupt character of the philosophy itself.

Vol. I.

II. (α) We are now secondly to enquire, how it came that St. John found this word λόγος so ready made to his hands, as to require no explanation. The answer to this will be found by tracing the gradual personification of the Word, or Wisdom of God, in the O. T. and Jewish writings. (β) We find faint traces of this personification in the book of Psalms: see Ps. xxiii. 4, 6; cxix. 89, 106; cvii. 20; cxlvii. 15, 18. But it was not the mere offspring of poetic diction. For the whole form and expression of the O. T. revelation was that of the Word of God. The Mosaic History opens with 'God said, Let there be light.' Spoken commands, either openly, or in visions, were the communications from God to man. It is the Word, in all the Prophets; the Word, in the Law; in short, the Word, in all God's dealings with his people: see further, Isa. xl. 8; lv. 10, 11; Jer. xxiii. 29 al. (γ) And as the Word of God was the constant idea for his revelations relatively to man, so was the Wisdom of God, for those which related to His own essence and attributes. That this was a later form of expression than the simple recognition of the divine Word in the Mosaic and early historical books, would naturally be the case, in the unfolding of spiritual knowledge and divine contemplation. His Almightiness was first felt, before His Wisdom and moral Purity were appreciated. In the books of Job (ch. xxviii. 12 ff.) and the Proverbs (ch. viii. ix.) we find this Wisdom of God personified; in the latter in very plain and striking terms; and this not poetically only, but practically; ascribing to the Wisdom of God all his revelation of Himself in His works of Creation and Providence. So that this Wisdom embraced in fact in itself the Power of God; and there wanted but the highest divine attribute, Love, to complete the idea. But this was reserved for the N. T. manifestation. (δ) The next evidences of the gradual personification of the Wisdom of God are found in the two Apocryphal Books, the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, and the Wisdom of Solomon. The first of these, originally written in Hebrew (see Winer, Realwörterbuch, s. v.), belongs probably to the latter half of the second century before Christ. In ch. i. 1, Wisdom is said to be παρὰ κυρίου, καὶ μετ' αὐτοῦ εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα: and in ver. 4, πρωτέρα πάντων ἐκτίσται σοφία. Then in ch. xxiv. 9—21, the same strain is continued; πρὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ἐκτίσιν με κ.τ.λ., and the passage concludes with these remarkable words, οἱ ἰσθιοντὶς με ἔτι πεινάσουσιν, καὶ οἱ πίνοντὶς με ἔτι διψήσουσιν. In the book of the Wisdom of Solomon, dating probably about 100 A.C., we find (in ch. vi. 22—ch. ix.) a similar personification and eulogy of Wisdom. In this remarkable passage we have Wisdom called πάρεδρος τῶν σῶν θρόνων (ch. ix. 4)—said to have been παρούσα ὅτε ἔκτισεν τὸν κόσμον (ch. ix. 9)—parallelized with ὁ λόγος σου (ch. ix. 1, 2: see also ch. xvi. 12). In ch. xviii. 15, 16, the παντοδύναμος λόγος is set forth as an Angel coming down from heaven, and destroying the Egyptians.

It seems highly probable that the author's monotheistic views were confused by the admixture of Platonism, and that he regarded Wisdom as a kind of soul of the world. He occasionally puts her for God, occasionally for an attribute of God. But he had not attained that near approach to a personal view which we shall find in the next step of our enquiry. (ε) The large body of Jews resident in Alexandria were celebrated for their gnosis, or religious philosophy. The origin of this philosophy must be referred to the mixture of the Jewish religious element with the speculative philosophies of the Greeks, more especially with that of Plato, and with ideas acquired during the captivity from Oriental sources. One of these Alexandrine writers in the second century A.C. was Aristobulus, some fragments of whose works have been preserved to us. He tells us that by the θεία φωνή we are not to understand ῥήτὴν λόγον, but ἔργων κατασκευάς—the whole working of God in the creation of the world.

But the most complete representation of the Judæo-alexandrine gnosis has come down to us in the work of Philo, who flourished cir. A.D. 40— It would be out of the province of a re to give a review of the system of Philo the result only of such review (see Lüdicke vol. i. 272—283) will be enough. He identifies the λόγος with the σοφία of God; is the εἰκὼν θεοῦ (Mangey, vol. i. p. 6: fr.); the ἀρχιτέκτων κ. παραδείγμα φωνῆς αὐτοῦ (i. 414): ὁ πρῶτος γεννητὴς αὐτοῦ, ὁ ἀγγελος πρεσβύτατος, ὡς ἀρχιτέκτων πολυώνυμος ὑπάρχων (i. 427: σκιά θεοῦ, ἡ καθάπερ ὄργανον χρησάμενος ἰσομοιοῦσι (i. 106): δι' οὗ ὁ κόσμος ἐκτετασθή (i. 162): τῷ δὲ ἀρχαγγέλῳ πρεσβυτάτῳ λόγῳ δωρεὰν ἐξείρετον ἐξ ἐνὸς τὰ ἅλα γεννήσας πατὴρ, ἵνα μεθόρι στάς τὸ γενόμενον διακρίνῃ τοῦ πεπαικότος.—ἀγάλλεται δὲ ἐπὶ τῇ δωρεᾷ, . . . ὅτε ἀνιέννητος ὡς ὁ θεὸς ἂν, οὐδὲ γεννητὸς ὡς ἡμεῖς, ἀλλὰ μίσος τῶν ἀπερ ἀμφοτέροις δημεύων (i. 501 f.): δύο γὰρ ὡς ἴσκειν, ἱερὰ θεοῦ, ἐν μὲν ὅδε ὁ κόσμος ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἀρχιτέκτονος ὁ πρῶτος ὄνομα αὐτοῦ θεοῦ λόγος (i. 653): ὁ τοῦ θεοῦ ἑταρὸς (i. 808): περιέχει πάντα καὶ πεπληρωμένος (ii. 655): δεύτερος θεός, ὅς ἐστιν ἐκεῖν ὁ λόγος (ii. 625, fragment, from Eusebii Præp. Evang. vii. 13, vol. iii. p. 544). These instances, the number of which might be much enlarged, will serve to shew how remarkably near to the dictum and import of some passages in our Gospel Philo approached in speaking of the λόγος.

At the same time there is a very and unmistakeable difference between the λόγος and that of the Apostle. He does not distinguish it from the Spirit of God (Lüdicke, i. p. 278), nor does he connect it with any Messianic ideas, though the latter were familiar to him. Besides, his views are strangely compounded of Platonism and Judaism. The λόγος seems to be one comprehending, or ruling, the δυνάμεις or ἰδέαι of God, which, although borrowed from Plato, he Judaically calls ἄγγελοι, and the λόγος their ἀρχαγγέλοι. We see by this however how fixed at the term, and many of its attributes, were in the religious philosophy of the Alexandrine Jews. (On the question whether the λόγος of Philo is to be taken as strictly personal, see Dörner's remarks on Lücke, in his Lehre von der Person Christi, i. p. 22 note.) (ζ) Meanwhile the Chaldaee paraphrasts of the O. T. had habitually used such expressions as קדש, or קדש, or קדש, 'the glory,' or 'the presence,' or 'the word,' of God,—in places where nothing but His own agency could be understood. The latter of these—the Memra, or word of God,—is used in so strictly personal a sense, that there can be little doubt that the Paraphrasts understood by it a divine Person or Emanation. (η) From these elements, the Alexandrine and Jewish views of the λόγος or σοφία of God, there appear to have arisen very early among Christians, both orthodox and heretic, formal expressions, in which these or equivalent terms were used. Of this the Apostle Paul furnishes the most eminent example. His teacher Gamaliel united in his instruction both these elements, and they are very perceptible in the writings of his pupil. But we do not find in them any direct use of the term λόγος, as personally applied to the Son of God. This shews him to have spoken mainly according to the Jewish school,—among whom, as Origen states, he could find none who held τὸ τὸν λόγον εἶναι τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ (cont. Cels. ii. 31, vol. i. p. 413). (θ) We find a much nearer approximation to the Alexandrine method of speech in the Epistle to the Hebrews, written evidently by some disciple intimately acquainted with the Alexandrine gnosis (see the opening verses, and especially φέρων τὰ πάντα τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ). But even there we have not the λόγος identified personally with the Lord Jesus Christ, nor indeed personally spoken of at all,—however near some passages may seem to approach to this usage (ch. iv. 12, 13; xi. 3). (ι) The Alexandrine gnosis was immediately connected with Ephesus, where the Gospel of John was probably written. Apollon (Acts xviii. 24) came thither from Alexandria; and Cerinthus is related by Theodoret (fab. hær. ii. 3, vol. iv. p. 389) to have studied and formed his philosophic system in Egypt, before coming to Ephesus.

sus. (κ) These notices will serve to account for the term λόγος being already found by St. John framed to his use; and the antignostic tendency of his writings will furnish an additional reason why he should rescue such important truths as the pre-existence and attributes of the divine λόγος from the perversions which false philosophy had begun to make of them. (λ) In all that has been said in this note, no insinuation has been conveyed that either the Apostle Paul, or the writer to the Hebrews, or John, adopted in any degree their teaching from the existing philosophies. Their teaching (which is totally distinct from any of those philosophies, as will be shewn in this commentary) is that of the Holy Spirit;—and the existing philosophies, with all their follies and inadequacies, must be regarded, in so far as they by their terms or ideas subverted the work which the Spirit had to do by the Apostles and teachers of Christianity, as so many providential preparations of the minds of men to receive the fuller effulgence of the Truth as it is in Jesus, which shines forth in these Scriptures.

The substance of this note has been derived from Dr. Lücke's Commentary, vol. i. p. 249—294; De Wette's Handbuch, on John i. 1; Dörner, Lehre von der Person Christi, i. p. 15 ff.; Olshausen, Comm. ii. p. 30 ff.

ἐν ἀρχῇ = πρὸ τοῦ τὸν κόσμον εἶναι, ch. xvii. 5. The expression is indefinite, and must be interpreted relatively to the matter spoken of. Thus in Acts xi. 15, it is 'the beginning of the Gospel;' and by the same principle of interpretation, here it is the beginning of all things, on account of the πάντα δι' αὐτ. ἐγ. ver. 3.

These words, if they do not assert, at least imply, the eternal pre-existence of the divine Word. For ἐν ἀρχῇ ἦν is not said of an act done ἐν ἀρχῇ (as in Gen. i. 1), but of a state existing ἐν ἀρχῇ, and therefore without beginning itself.

ἦν, not equivalent to ἔστιν (see ἐγώ εἰμι, ch. viii. 58 al.), as Euthymius and others have supposed; but Origen has given the true reason for the indefinite past being used,—ἦν μὲν κυριώτατον ἐκείνῳ

The existence of an enduring and unlimited state of being, implied in ἦν, is contrasted with ἔγενετο in ver. 3, and especially in ver. 14. καὶ δ' ἁ. ἦν πρὸς τ. θ.] The usage of πρὸς here, as with (i.e. 'chez'), is sufficiently borne out by the ref.

Basil remarks (Lücke, i. 297) that John says πρὸς τὸν θ., not ἐν τῷ θ., ἵνα τὸ ἰδιόζον τῆς ὑποστάσεως παραστήσῃ, . . . ἵνα μὴ πρόφασιν ὧς τῇ συγχύσει τῆς ὑποστάσεως. Both the inner substantial union, and the distinct personality of the λόγος are here asserted. The former is distinctly repeated in the next words. κ. θ. ἦν δ' ἁ.] and the Word was God. As regards the form of the sentence, it is strictly parallel with πνεῦμα ὁ θεός, ch. iv. 24. But the sense to be conveyed here is as weighty a consideration as the form of the sentence. Had John intended to say, 'God was the Word,'—what meaning could his assertion possibly have conveyed? None other than a contradiction to his last assertion, by which he had distinguished God from the Word. And not only would this be the case, but the assertion would be inconsistent with the whole historical idea of the λόγος, making this term to signify merely an attribute of God, just as when it is said ὁ θεός ἀγάπη ἐστίν. Not to mention the unprecedented inversion of subject and predicate which this would occasion; ὁ λόγος having been the subject before, and again resumed as the subject afterwards.

The rendering of the words being then as above, their meaning is the next question. The omission of the article before θεός is not mere usage; it could not have been here expressed, whatever place the words might hold in the sentence. ὁ λόγος ἦν ὁ θεός would give a sense liable to the objections first stated, and destroy the idea of the λόγος altogether. θεός must then be taken as implying God, in substance and essence,—not ὁ θεός, 'the Father,' in Person. It does not = θεῖος, nor is it to be rendered a God—but, as in σὰρξ ἔγενετο, σὰρξ expresses that state into which the Divine Word entered by a definite act, so in θεός ἦν, θεός expresses that essence which was His ἐν ὁρχῇ that He was very God. So that this verse might be connected thus: the Logos was from eternity,—was with God (Father),—and was Himself God.

2.] In order to direct the mind to difference (in unity) between this λόγος and ὁ θεός, John recalls the reader's attention to the two first clauses of ver. which he now combines, in order to point on to the creative work, which distinct belongs to the λόγος. Thus also this verse fixes the reference of αὐτοῦ in the which might otherwise, after the mention of θεός, have seemed ambiguous.

3.] πάντα = τὰ πάντα (1 Cor. viii. Col. i. 16), = ὁ κόσμος, ver. 10. The parallelism of itself refutes the Socinian interpretation of πάντα, 'all Christian graces and virtues,' 'the whole moral world.' But the history of the text λόγος forbids such an explanation entirely. For Philo (i. 162) says εὐρὴς αἴτιον μὲν αὐτοῦ (τοῦ κόσμου) τὸν θεὸν ὑπ' οὗ γέγονεν ἔλην δέ, τὰ ῥήματα στοιχεῖα, ἱεὺς συνειράθη: ὅργανον λόγον θεοῦ, δὲ οὐ κατεσκευάσθη: see a Col. i. 16, and Heb. i. 2. Olshausen observes, that we never read in Scripture that 'Christ made the world,' but 'the Father made the world διὰ the Son,' 'the world was made ὑπὸ the Father and διὰ the Son:' because the Son was the works of Himself, but always as the revelation of the Father; His work is the Father's will, and the Father has Will, except the Son, who is all His work (ἐν ᾧ ἐδόκῃσεν). The Christian Fathers rightly therefore rejected the semi-Arian formula, 'The Son was begotten by an act of the Father's will;' for He is that Will Himself.

καὶ χωρ. αὐτ.] This addition is not merely a Hebraistic parallelism but a distinct denial of the eternity and uncreatedness of matter as held by the Gnostics. They set matter, as a separate existence, over against God, and made the origin of evil:—but John excluded any such notion. Nothing was made without Him (the λόγος); all matter and implicitly evil itself, in the deep and inscrutable purposes of creation (for οὐκ ἦν ἐν τῇ ἀρχῇ ἀλλὰ γέγονεν), αὐτοῦ ἔγενετο. The punctuation the end of the verse is uncertain, if we regard solely manuscript authority, but re-

on the sense of the passage, which is rendered weak, and inconsistent with analogy, by placing the period after οὐδὲ ἵν:—weak, because in that case we must render 'That which was made by Him was life (i. e. having life), and that life was the light of men;' but how was that life, i. e. that living creation which was made by Him, the light of men?—inconsistent with grammatical analogy, for John never uses γινισθαι ἵν for 'to be made by.' Besides which, John's usage of beginning a sentence with ἵν and a demonstrative pron. should have its weight: cf. ch. xiii. 35; xv. 8; xvi. 26: 1 John ii. 3, 4, 5; iii. (8), 10, 16, 19, 24; iv. 2 al. fr. Compare also ἵν ῥοσφῶς ἡ ἀλήθεια οὐκ ἔστιν, 1 John ii. 4.—ἀμαρτία ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστιν, ib. iii. 5. I have determined therefore for the ordinary punctuation. It is said to have been first adopted owing to an abuse of the passage by the Macedonian heretics, who maintained that if the exclusion was complete, the Holy Spirit can also not have been without His creating power, i. e. was created by Him. But this would be refuted without including δ γίγονεν, for the Holy Spirit ἦν, not ἐγένετο.

4.] ἐν αὐτ. ζωῇ ἦν—compare 1 John v. 11, i. 1, 2, and ch. vi. 33. ζωῇ is not merely 'spiritual life,' nor 'the recovery of blessedness,'—as Tholuck, Kuinoel, &c. explain it:—the λόγος is the source of all life to the creature, not indeed ultimately, but mediately (see ch. v. 26: 1 John v. 11).

κ. ἡ ζωῇ ἦν τ. φῶς τ. ἐνθ.] This is not to be understood of the teaching of the Incarnate Logos, but of the enlightening and life-sustaining influence of the eternal Son of God, in Whom was life. In the material world, light, the offspring of the Word of God, is the condition of life, and without it life degenerates and expires:—so also in the spiritual world that life which is in Him, is to the creature the very condition of all development and furtherance of the life of the spirit. All knowledge, all purity, all love, all happiness, spring up and grow from this life, which is the light to them all.

It is not φῶς, but τὸ φῶς:—because this is the only true light: see ver. 9, also 1 John i. 5. 5.] As light and life are closely connected ideas, so are death and darkness. The whole world, lying in death and in darkness, is the σκοτία here spoken of:—not merely the σκοτωμένοι (Eph. iv. 18; see ib. v. 7, 8), but the whole mass, with the sole exception (see below, ver. 12) of ὅσοι ἐλάβον αὐτὸν (compare ch. iii. 19; 1 John v. 19).

This φαίνει is not merely the historical present, but describes the whole process of the light of life in the Eternal Word shining in this evil and dark world; both by the O. T. revelations, and (see ch. x. 16; xi. 52) by all the scattered fragments of light glittering among the thick darkness of heathendom. καὶ . . .

κατέλ.] and the darkness comprehended (understood, apprehended) it not. That this is the meaning, will be clear from the context. John states here as a general fact, what he afterwards states of the appearance of the Incarnate Word to the chosen people, ver. 11. The sentences are strictly parallel. τὸ φ. ἐν τῇ σκ. φαίνει || εἰς τὰ ἴδια ἦλθεν, and κ. ἡ σκ. αὐτὸ οὐ κατέλ. || καὶ οἱ ἰδιοὶ αὐτὸν οὐ παρέλαβον. In the first, he is speaking of the whole shining of this light over the world; in the second, of its historical manifestation to the Jews. In both cases, the Divine Word was rejected. παρέλαβον is used in the second case as expressing the personal assumption to oneself as a friend or companion: see reff. Lücke observes (i. 313), that the almost tragic tone of this verse is prevalent through the Gospel of John and his first epistle, see ch. iii. 19; xii. 37 ff. al.: and is occasionally found in Paul also, see Rom. i. 18 ff.

The other interpretation of παρέλαβον, 'overtook,' 'came upon' (for that of 'overcame' [Orig., Theophyl., Euthym.] is not admissible, the word never importing this), is unobjectionable as far as the usage of the word is concerned (see ch. xii. 35: Mark ix. 18); but yields no sense in the context.

The connexion of the two members of our verse by καὶ is not, "The Light shineth in the darkness, and therefore (i. e. because darkness is the opposition to light, and they exclude one another) the darkness comprehended it not;" but, "The Light shineth in the darkness, and yet (notwithstanding that the effect of light in darkness is so great and immediate in the physical world) the darkness compre-Mopsuest. in loc. p. 729, ed. Migne.) He enunciates briefly in these verses 6, 7, what he afterwards, vv. 19—36, narrates with historical detail.

ἐγένετο—not belonging to ἀπεισταλμένος, but to ἄνθρ.: the ordinary opening of an historical period, see Luke i. 5. No stress on ἐγένετο, as distinguished from ἦν, ver. 1 (Olshausen), see ch. iii. 1. There was—a man sent, &c. In ἀπεστ. παρὰ θεοῦ we have possibly a reference to Mal. iii. 1.

7.] The purpose of John's coming was to bear witness to a fact, which fact (ver. 33) was made known to him by divine revelation.

εἰς μαρτυρίαν, not as E. V., 'for a witness,' but, for witness, for the purpose of bearing witness: so A. V. R.

ἵνα μαρτ. κ.τ.λ. is an expansion of εἰς μαρτ.—the subject of his testimony was to be the Light,—and the aim of it, that all might believe (εἰς τὸ φῶς, see ch. xii. 36) through him (i. e. John: not τοῦ φωτός [Grot.], which confuses the whole, for then we must understand εἰς θεόν after πιστ. which is here out of place).

8.] John was himself ὁ λύχνος ὁ καίόμενος καὶ φαίνων (ch. v. 35), see note on Matt. v. 14, but not τὸ φῶς. On ἵνα, see ref.: it belongs to ἦν, not to ἦλθεν above. And thus there is no ellipsis of 'came' or 'was sent': John simply was, in order to &c.

9.] The word ἀληθινόν (see ref.) in this connexion imports original, 'archetypal,' and is used of the true genuine sources and patterns of those things which we find here below only in fragmentary imitations and derivations.

Such an original was the Light here spoken of;—but John was only a derived light,—not lumen illuminans, but lumen illuminatus.

The construction of this verse has been much disputed. Is ἐρχόμενον εἰς τ. κ. to be taken with ἀθροῦσαν (as latt syrr copt Orig Eus, Epiph Chr Cyr Thl Euthym and most of the ancient Commentators and E. V.), or does it belong to τὸ φῶς τὸ ἀλ.?

The former construction can only be defended by a Rabbinical usage, by which εἰς τ. κ. means 'all men' (Schöttgen, i. 223). But it is very questionable whether John ever speaks thus. Certainly he does not, in any of the passages commonly cited to defend this rendering, ch. xviii. 37 (which is spoken by Christ of Himself and His Mission); xvi. 21, 28; xii. 46. And even if he had thus spoken, how harsh and how unmeaning is the sentence; whether with Euthym. we lay an emphasis on ἦν, or with E. V. &c. supply τοῦτο before it. If this latter had been intended, surely it would have been more distinctly expressed; and even when it is supplied, we have in this verse only a less forcible repetition of ver. 4. It seems then that we must join ἐρχ. εἰς τ. κ. with τ. φῶς τ. ἀληθ.

But even then, three ways of rendering are apparently open to us.

The first of these, which is that of Socinus, takes ἐρχόμεν. κ.τ.λ. as meaning, 'at its coming into the world.' This however—besides the sense being inconsistent with ver. 4—leaves the opening clause without a demonstrative pronoun, as before. Then, secondly, ἐρχόμενον might seem to be used in the sense in which we frequently have ἐρχόμενος, as a quasi-future, 'who was, or is, to come'; see Matt. xi. 3; Mark x. 30 al. fr.; ch. vi. 14; xi. 27, in which last two places it is joined, as here, with εἰς τὸν κόσμον. But if this be adopted (which even constructionally is very doubtful), the only sense will be that the true light, &c. was to come; i. e. had not yet come; which manifestly is not correct;—for it had come, when John gave his witness; and the whole of these verses 6—13 relate to the time when He had appeared, and came to His own. We are driven then to the only legitimate rendering, which is to take ἦν ἐρχόμενον as equivalent to an imperfect came:—this usage being frequent in the N. T., see ref.:—i. e. at the time when John bore this witness, the true light which lighteth every man, came—was in process of manifesting Himself,—into the world. Tholuck objects to this construction that ἦν is too far from ἐρχόμενον:—but Lücke answers, that ἦσαν and νησιεύοντες are nearly as far separated in Mark ii. 18.

10.] The κόσμος is a further expansion of τὸ ἄλλῃθεν. 10.] The κόσμος is the created world, into which He came (ver. 9), which was made by Him (ver. 3), which nevertheless (i. e. as here represented by man, the only creature who γινώσκει) knew, recognized Him not. καὶ is as in ver. 5.

αὐτόν, not αὐτό, because though τὸ φῶς has been the subject, yet the δε' αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο brings in again the creative λόγος, Who is the Light. The three members of the sentence form a climax:—He was in the world (and therefore the world should have known Him), and the world was made by Him (much more then should it have known Him), and the world knew Him not.

11.] τὰ ἴδια here cannot well mean the world, or of those mankind in general: it would be difficult to point out any Scripture usage to justify such a meaning. But abundance of passages bear out the meaning which makes τὰ ἴδια His own inheritance or possession, i. e. Judea; and of ἴδιοι, the Jews; compare especially the parable Matt. xxi. 33 ff.; and Sir. xxiv. 7 ff. And thus ἦλθεν forms a nearer step in the approach to the declaration in ver. 14. He came to His own. On παρέλ.

12.] The ὅσοι . . . primarily refers to the εἰσβολή among the Jews who have just been spoken of: but also, by implication, being opposed to both ὁ κόσμος and οἱ ἴδιοι, the εἰσβολή in all the world. ελαβον = παρέλαβον above—as many as recognized Him as that which He was—the Word of God and Light of men.

ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἐξουσίαν. is not merely capability = δύναμιν (Lücke),—still less privilege or prerogative (Chrysost. and others),—but power (De Wette); involving all the actions and states needful to their so becoming, and removing all the obstacles in their way (e. g. the wrath of God, and the guilt of sin).

τέκνα θ. γενέσθαι.] The spiritual life owes its beginning to a birth from above, ch. iii. 3—7. And this birth is owing to the Holy Spirit of God; so that this is equivalent to saying, 'As many as received Him, to them gave He His Holy Spirit.' And we find that it was so: see Acts x. 44.

τέκνα θ. is a more comprehensive expression than viol. τ. θ. which brings out rather our adoption, and hope of inheritance (Rom. viii. 14 ff.), whereas the other involves the whole generation and process of our life in the Spirit, as being from and of God, and consequently our likeness to God, walking in light as He is in light (1 John i. 5—7)—free from sin (ib. iii. 9; v. 18) and death (ch. viii. 51).

τοῖς π. εἰς τ. ἐν. αὐτοῦ.] τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ is His manifestation as that which He has given Himself out to be: i. e. as a Saviour from sin; see Matt. i. 21, καλίστους τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦν αὐτοῦ γὰρ σώσει τὸν λαόν αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν αὐτῶν.

13.] The Jews grounded their claim to be children of God on their descent from Abraham. John here negatives any such claim, and asserts the exclusive divine birth of all who become children of God by faith. It is to be noticed that the conjunctions here are not the merely disjunctive ones οὐτε . . . οὐτε which would necessitate the ranging the clauses as co-ordinate and parallel, but οὐδὲ . . . οὐδὲ, which rise in climax from one clause to another,—‘not ἐκ αἱμάτων, nor yet ἐκ θελ. σαρκ. nor yet ἐκ θελ. ἀνδρ., but ἐκ θεοῦ’ (see examples of οὐτε, Matt. xii. 32: of οὐδέ, Matt. vi. 26). Many Interpreters have seen in θίλημα ἀνδρός the male, and in θίλημα σαρκός the female side of human concupiscence (so Augustine, Theophylact, &c.); or in the former the higher and more conscious, in the latter the lower and animal side (Bleek, Luthardt). Besides the above, other objections lie against both these interpretations.—(1) that σάρξ is never so used (Eph. v. 29 is no instance in point); (2) that θίλημα is ascribed to both. Euthymius seems to give the right interpretation: εἰπὼν δὲ ὅτι οὐκ ἐκ αἱμάτων, ἐπήγαγε φανερώτερον ὅτι οὐδὲ ἐκ θελήματος σαρκός· εἶτα καὶ τοῦτο τελειώτερον ἐφηρμήνευσεν, προσθεῖς ὅτι οὐκ ἐκ θελήματος ἀνδρός· αἷμα γὰρ καὶ σάρξ, ὁ ἀνὴρ· θίλημα δὲ νῦν νοῦν τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν, τὴν συνουσίαν: in loc. ii. 421. Or perhaps this may be carried somewhat further, and we may better satisfy the climax by regarding the ἐκ αἱμάτων as indicating the mere phenomena of physical generation wherever found: then rising to ἐκ θελήματος σαρκός, the instigation of that capacity by sexual desire: then rising still higher to the most exalted instance of that desire, ἐκ θελήματος ἀνδρός. The plural usage of αἱμάτων is only found in one other place in this signification,—Eurip. Ion, 693 Dind. 706 Herm. ἔχει δόλον τύχαν θ' ὁ παῖς | ἄλλων τραφεῖς ἀφ' αἱμάτων. The other usage of the plural, for murder, is frequent in the LXX and the classics.

ἀνὴρ, in the sense of man generally, is not uncommon; we have in plur. πατὴρ ἀνδρῶν τε θεῶν τε, in Hom. passim; and in sing. II. v. 321; s. 432, 433. ἐκ, remarks De Wette, denotes, the first time, the material—the second and third time, the mediate cause—the fourth time, the immediate cause the generation. 14.] καὶ must not understood (Chrysost. Grot. Lampe, Th. phylact, al.) as giving a reason for 1 verse before; it is only the same copula in vv. 1, 3, 4, 5; passing on to a further assertion regarding the Word.

ὁ ¹θεός. [ἐκ.] became flesh: the most general expression of the great truth that He became man. He became that, of which man is the body compounded. There is no reference here to the doctrine of the Lord Jesus being the second Adam, as Olshausen thinks; but although there may be no reference to it, it lies at the ground of the wideness of expression. The doctrine this form may have been, as Lücke serves, alien to John's habits of thought but not that which is implied in the doctrine, the taking of the nature of man the Eternal Word.

The simplicity this expression is no doubt directed against the Docetæ of the Apostle's time, who maintained that the Word only apparent took human nature. Therefore he σαρξ ἐγένετο, absolutely and literally he came flesh:—see ref. 1 John. The expression is not guarded against the interpretation of the Apollinarian heretics, who held that the Lord had not a human σο (ψυχή); but this error was not in the Apostle's view, and is abundantly refuted elsewhere (see Matt. xxvi. 38 and note c 36—46, and the references there made to John's Gospel).

ἐσκήνωσεν. [¹ε] *journe*d, or ‘tabernacled,’ in us. The is no reference to the flesh being the tabernacle of the Spirit;—but the word is one technically used in Scripture to import the dwelling of God among men. This is the Apostle's testimony as such, see Acts i. 21.

The mention of δόξα seems to be suggested by the word ἐσκήνωσαν, so frequently used of the divine Presence or Shechinah, and cognate in its very form with it : 'æodem litteræ in πνεῦμα et σηνή.' Bengel. This glory was seen by the disciples, ch. ii. 11; xi. 4 : also by Peter, James, and John, specially, on the mount of transfiguration : to which occasion the words ὡς μονογενοῦς πατρός seem to refer : but mainly, in the whole converse and teaching and suffering of the Lord, who was full of grace and truth : see below.

On ὡς Chrysostom remarks (Hom. xii. in Joan. p. 66), οὐχ ὁμοιωσιως, οὐδὲ παραβολῆς, ἀλλὰ βεβαιωσιως καὶ ἀναμφισβητήτου ὁρισμοῦ : ὥσαντι ἔλεγεν Ἐθ. δόξαν ὡς ἐκπεσε καὶ ἐκὸς ἔχειν μονογενῆ καὶ γνήσιον υἱὸν ὄντα τοῦ πάντων βασιλέως τοῦ (see reff.).

μονον.] This word applied to Christ is peculiar to John : see reff. In the N. T. usage it signifies the only son :—in the LXX, Ps. xxi. 20, the beloved, and Ps. xxiv. 16, one deserted, left alone. It has been attempted to render the word in John, according to the usage in Ps. xxi. 20. But obviously in the midst of ideas reaching so far deeper than that of regard, or love, of the Father for the Son, the word cannot be interpreted except in accordance with them. It refers to, and contrasts with, the τίκτα τοῦ θεοῦ in vv. 12, 13. They receive their divine birth by faith in Him, and through Him; but H^z is the μονογενής of the Father in the higher sense, in which He is γεννηθείς the Son of God.

παρὰ πατρός belongs to μονογενοῦς; not to δόξαν, as Theophyl. Erasmus. Grot. suppose.

The ellipse is to be supplied by considering the state in which the λόγος here appears,—that of having become σὰρξ and dwelling among us.

πλήρης χ. κ. ἀλ.] These words have been variously connected. The view of Erasmus, who places the period at πατρός, and connects these words with Ἰωάννης, scarcely needs refutation, whether we regard the construction, or the meaning of the sentence. The reading πλήρη has probably arisen from a correction, to connect the adj. with δόξαν. Some do this even with πλήρης, but both the construction and the sense are against it. It was not the δόξα, but He Himself, that was πλήρης χ. κ. ἀλ. : see below, ver. 17. Others suppose πλήρης to refer directly to μονογενοῦς, and justify this by Eph. iii. 17, 18. But besides the unnecessary harshness of this, the sense is against it also; for it cannot be said, "we saw His glory, the glory as of one who was full of grace and truth;" we must have the ὡς referring, in the sense of ὡς ἐκπεσε (see above), to some mysterious hidden character which the glory testified, whereas the πλήρης χ. κ. ἀλ. is itself a mere matter of fact, to which the Apostles themselves could (ver. 17) bear witness. Another construction is (as usually done and in E. V.) to take καὶ . . . πατρός as parenthetical, and connect πλήρης immediately with ἐσκήνωσαν. Such parentheses are common in the style of this Gospel : see ch. vi. 22—24; xi. 2; xix. 23, 24; ib. ver. 31. But by far the best is, to regard πλήρης as referring to αὐτοῦ, by an anomaly in concord often found in the N. T. (see Luke xx. 27 note; xxiv. 47), and especially in the Apocalypse,—cf. Rev. i. 4 al. fr.

χάρ. κ. ἀλ.] not = χάριτος ἀληθινῆς, which destroys the precision of the expression, and itself conveys no sense whatever; but setting out the two sides of the divine manifestation in Christ,—χάρις, as the result of Love to mankind,—ἀλήθεια (see reff. and ch. xiv. 6), as the unity, purity, and light of His own Character.

15.] The testimony of John, so important as being the fulfilment of the very object for which he was ἀποσταλμένος παρὰ θεοῦ, is in this prologue ranged, so to speak, parallel with the assertions and testimony of the Evangelist himself. So that this verse does not interrupt the train of thought, but confirms by this important testimony the assertion ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγ., shewing that John bore witness to His præ-existence. Then (ver. 16) the πλήρ. χ. κ. ἀλ. is again taken up. Euthymius paraphrases : εἰ καὶ μὴ ἐγώ, φησι, δοκῶ τισιν ἰσως ἀξιόπιστος, ἀλλὰ πρὸ ἰμοῦ ὁ Ἰωάννης μαρτυρεῖ περὶ τῆς θεότητος αὐτοῦ, Ἰωάννης ἑκείνος, οὗ τὸ ὄνομα μίγα καὶ περιβόητον παρὰ πᾶσι τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις.

...] This form of the words seems to shew, as indeed would appear from the announcement of his own office by the Baptist, that he had uttered these words in the power of the Spirit concerning Him whose forerunner he was before he saw and recognized Him in the flesh. Then, on doing so, he exclaimed, This was He of whom I said, &c. This view seems to be borne out by his own statement, ver. 33, and by the order of the narrative in Matt. iii. 11, 12, 13. ὀπίσω μ. ἐρχ.] In point of time; not of birth merely or principally, nor of commencement of official life: but, inasmuch as John was His Forerunner, on account of official position.

ἔμπροσθέν μ. γέγονεν] The E. V. is here very accurate,—is preferred before me; the γέγονεν setting forth the advancement to official dignity before which John's office waned and decreased (ch. iii. 30), which took place even while John's course was being fulfilled. The only objection to 'preferred' is, its possible ambiguity. Even Dr. Johnson has fallen into the mistake, in his Dictionary, of quoting this passage as an instance of the sense "to love more than another." 'Is advanced,' 'hath come to be' [which however again is ambiguous], are other possible renderings. This sense of ἔμπροσθεν (besides refl.) is justified by classical usage in Plato, who uses ἔμπροσθεν τιθίνα for præponere, Legg. vii. 805. See also i. 631; v. 743. Also Demosthenes, κατὰ Διονυσιοδώρου, p. 1296. 26, . . . τὰς αἰτίας τῶν ἡδικηκότων ἔμπροσθεν οὐσας τοῦ δικαίου. ὅτι πρῶτός μου ἦν] The only sense which these words will bear, is, because (or, for, but better because) He was (not ነῦν, but ἦν as in ver. 1) before me; i. e. 'He existed, was in being, before me.' The question raised by Lücke and De Wette, whether it is probable that the Baptist had, or expressed such views of the præ-existence of Christ, is not one for us to deal in the face of so direct a testimony as is given to the fact, here and in iii. 27 ff. In all probability, the Evangelist was himself a disciple of the Baptist: and if he has given us a fuller somewhat differing account of his testimony to Christ, it is because his more information were ampler than those of other Evangelists. The questioners to forget that the Baptist was div raised up and commissioned, and for the Holy Ghost, and spoke in that power his declarations were not therefore in conclusions which he had arrived at a natural means,—the study of the prophecies, &c. (Lücke, p. 353): but inspired revelations of the Spirit. last is fully recognized by Olshause 61).

18.] Origen (in Evang. Jo tom. vi. 2, vol. iv. p. 102) blames Heraclitus for terminating the testimony of Christ at the end of ver. 17, and makes it continue to the end of ver. 18. But this hardly be, for then ἡμεῖς πάντες we bear no very definite meaning, and assertions in ver. 17 would be alien to the character of the Baptist, belonging they do to the more mature development of Christian doctrines. I cannot doubt this and the following verses belong to the Evangelist, and are a carrying on of his declarations concerning the divine Word.

Ver. 15 is not parenthetical but confirmatory of ver. 14, and this grounds itself on the fact of ver. 14, corroborated by the testimony of ver. 1 that He dwelt among us, and that we His glory, full of grace and truth.

τὸ πλήρωμα is that of which He πλήρης, ver. 14, and is not connected the Gnostic pleroma at all. See refl. ἡμεῖς πάντες] All who believe on Christ see ver. 12. ἐλάβομεν, καὶ] recei βομεν is spoken entirely of the times of the Incarnate Word: and besides, ὁ νόμος and χάρις are distinctly opposed to one another in the next verse.

The prep. ἀντί is properly used of any thing which supercedes another, or occupies its place. This is in fact its ordinary usage when exchange is spoken of: the possession of the thing gotten succeeds to, supersedes, the possession of the thing given in exchange, and I possess τοῦτο ἀντί κεῖνου. Thus also we have received χάριν ἀντί χάριτος, continual accessions of grace; new grace coming upon and superseding the former. Thus in Theognis, Sentt. 343 ff. (Lücke), τεθναιῖν δ' εἰ μή τι κακῶν ἄμικτα μερμυῖναι | εὐροίμην, δόεις δ' ἀντ' ἀνίων ἀνίας. And Chrysostom, de Sacerdotio, 6. 13, vol. i. p. 485, οὐ δέ με ἐκίμπτεις, ἐτέραν ἀντ' ἐτέρας φρονιδα ἰθεῖς. Also Philo, i. 254, speaking of this very word χάρις:—τάς πρώτας αἰεὶ χάριτας . . . ἐπισχῶν καὶ ταμιευσάμενος ἰεσῶθις ἐτέρας ἀντὶ κελευν καὶ τρίτας ἀντὶ δευτέρων, καὶ αἰεὶ νέας ἀντὶ παλαιωτέρων, τότε μὲν διαφοροῦσας, τότε δ' αὖ καὶ τὰς αὐτὰς ἐπιιδύσει. 17.] The connexion of this verse with the foregoing lies in the words τοῦ πληρώματος αὐτοῦ (ver. 16), and in χάρις κ. ἀλ. (ver. 14.) 'We received from His fulness continual additions of grace, because that fulness is not, like the law, a positive enactment, finite and circumscribed, of which it could be said that it ἰδόθη, but the bringing in of grace and truth, which ἐγένετο by Jesus Christ.'

ἰδόθη and ἐγένετο have been variously distinguished,—αὐθεντικὸν μὲν τὸ ἐγένετο, δουλικὸν δὲ τὸ ἰδόθη, Theophyl. Similarly Bengel, 'Mosis non sua est lex: Christi sua est gratia et veritas.' Clem. Alex. Pæd. i. 7, p. 134 P, says: διὸ καὶ φησιν ἡ γραφή "ὁ νόμος διὰ Μωυσείως ἰδόθη," οὐχὶ ὑπὸ Μωυσείως, ἀλλὰ ὑπὸ μὲν τοῦ λόγου, διὰ Μωυσείως δὲ τοῦ θεράποντος αὐτοῦ διὰ καὶ πρόσκαιρος ἐγένετο, ἡ δὲ αἰδὶς χάρις καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ ἐγένετο, κ.τ.λ. Origen (in Joan. tom. vi. c. 3, vol. iv. p. 107) speaks very similarly. But the distinction laid down above, which is hinted at by De Wette, seems to me to be the most obvious, and best suited to the context, where the πλήρωμα of Christ is set against the narrowness of positive enactment in the law. Certainly, the distinction must not be lost sight of, nor denied, as Lücke attempts to do: for Bengel truly observes: "Nullus philosophus tam accurate verba ponit, differentiamque eorum observat, quam Johannes, in hoc præsertim capite."

χάρις κ. ἀλ.] I must again caution the student against any such wholly inadequate explanations as that these words are put 'per Hendiadyon' for χάρις ἀληθινή. It is in this way that the depths of Scripture have been covered over by the rubbish of expositors. Such was not the method of investigation pursued by the great men of former centuries: witness Origen in loc.: εἰ γὰρ Ἰησοῦς ἴσταιν ὁ φάσκων "ἐγὼ εἰμι ἡ ἀλήθεια," πῶς ἡ ἀλήθεια διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ γίνεται; ἀτόπος γὰρ τις εἰ ταυτοῦ οὐ γίνεται. ἀλλὰ νοητῶν οὐτὶ ἡ ἀντοαλήθεια ἡ οὐσιώδης καὶ ἴν' οὕτως εἴπω πρωτότυπος τῆς ἐν ταῖς λογικαῖς ψυχαῖς ἀληθείας . . . οὐχὶ διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ ἐγένετο, οὐδ' ὅλως διὰ τινος, ἀλλ' ὑπὸ θεοῦ ἐγένετο ὥς καὶ ὁ λόγος οὐ διὰ τινος, ὁ ἐν ἀρχῇ πρὸς τὸν θεόν, καὶ ἡ σοφία, ἣν ἱερίσιν ἀρχὴν δέων αὐτοῦ ὁ θεός, οὐ διὰ τινος, οὕτως οὐδὲ ἡ ἀλήθεια διὰ τινος. ἡ δὲ παρ' ἀνθρώπων ἀλήθεια διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ ἐγένετο ὡς ἐν Παύλῳ ἀλ. καὶ τοῖς ἀποστόλοις διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ ἐγένετο (vol. iv. p. 107).

18.] The connexion is: 'Moses could not give out of the πλήρωμα of grace and truth, for he had no immediate sight of God, and no man can have: there is but One who can ἐξηγησθαι θεόν, the μονογενὴς υἱός, who is no mere man, but abides in the bosom of the Father.'

θ. σὺν. ἑρ. π.] The sight of God here meant, is not only bodily sight (though of that it is true, see Exod. xxxiii. 20: 1 Tim. vi. 16), but intuitive and infallible knowledge, which enables Him who has it to declare the nature and will of God: see ch. iii. 11; vi. 46; xiv. 7.

The Evangelist speaks in this verse in accordance with the sayings of the gnosis whose phraseology he has adopted; τίς ἑώρακεν αὐτὸν καὶ ἐκδηγήσεται; Sir. xliii. 31.

ὁ μὲν υἱός] As regards the reading ὁ μονογενὴς υἱός, the authorities for and against it will be found in the digest. It seems to have arisen from a confusion of the contracted forms of writing, Υἱ and ΘC. The question, which reading to adopt, is one which, in the balance of authorities, must be provisionally decided by the consideration that as far as we can see, we should be introducing great harshness into the sentence, and a new and strange term into Scripture, by adopting υἱός: a con-

Filius vero, quod in patris sinu est videns per Sic "omnia per filium facta sunt et sine illo factum est nihil." There cannot therefore be the smallest doubt that Tertullian really read filius. Equally clear is evidence of HIPPOLYTUS: Ὁρῶν δὲ τὸν θεὸν οὐδ' εἰς εἰ μὴ μόνος ὁ παῖς, καὶ τὸ ἄνθρωπος, καὶ μόνος διηγησάμενος τὴν βουλὴν τοῦ πατρός. λίγει γὰρ καὶ ἰσά θεὸν οὐδεὶς ἔωρακεν πῶποτε μονογενὴς υἱός, ὁ ὢν εἰς τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρός, ἐξηγήσατο. (Contr. Hæc. Noeti, c. v. p. 812, Migne. Patrol. vol. x.) On same side is the SYNOICAL EPISTLE OF THE ANTIOCHENE COUNCIL which denied Paul of Samosata: Ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ τὸν νόμον ὁμοίως Μωσῇ φαμέν δεδιδασκονῶντος τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ [Gal. iii. 19: Exod. iii. 2, 4, 16, and iv. 1]. [Exod. xxxiii. 17—19] ὅπερ τελειοῦται οὕτως . . . EUSEBIUS, the facts seem to be as follows:—that he distinctly "quotes the passage with the reading υἱὸς not less than six times. In one case indeed (De Eccles. T. lib. i. c. 9 [vol. vi. p. 840, ed. Migne]) the words ὁ μονογενὴς θεός are added; "ὁ μονογενὴς υἱός. This passage alone, however, when carefully examined with context, seems enough to disprove this claim; and when it is taken in connexion "at least five other unequivocal quotations in which Eusebius reads υἱός, there it appears to be no room for doubt." (Mr. E. Abbot in the Andover "Bibliot. Sacra," Oct. 1861.) The summary of the chapter in which the passage above referred to occurs is "that the Son does not subsist in the same way as τὰ πολλὰ κτίσματα. After quoting "This is my beloved Son," Eusebius goes on: Αὐτοῦ τοιγαροῦν τοῦ ὁμοῦ θεοῦ ταύτην αὐτῷ τὴν μαρτυρίαν παρασχομένου τοῦ τε ἐπαγγελιστοῦ διαβήναι αὐτὸν Ἰδὼν μονογενὴ εἶναι διδάσκοντος δι' ὧν ἰφῇ "Θεὸν οὐδεὶς ἔωρακε πῶποτε ὁ μονογενὴς υἱός, ὁ ὢν εἰς τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρός, ἐκεῖνος ἐξηγήσατο." ATHANASIUS apparently knew of no other reading but υἱός "distinctly quotes the text 4 times, and refers to it thrice in addition. HIL

"has commented on his quotation of Joh. i. 18 (De Trin. lib. vi. cap. 39 [vol. ii. p. 163]) "in such a way as to demonstrate that he read Filius. He remarks: Natura fides non satis explicata videbatur ex nomine 'Filii,' nisi proprietatis extrinsecus virtus per exceptionis significantiam adderetur. Præter 'Filium' enim, et 'unigenitum' cognominans, suspicionem adoptionis penitus exsecuit. The only passage, so far as "I know, in all Hilary's writings, which has even the appearance of supporting the "reading unigenitus Deus is in his work De Trin. lib. xii. cap. 24 [vol. ii. p. 422]. "Having quoted Exod. iii. 14, Misit me ad vos is qui est (Sept. ὁ ὢν), and remark- "ing Deo proprium esse id quod est non ambigens sensus est, he goes on to argue that "this expression implies eternity, and then says: Quod igitur et per Moysen de Deo significatum . . . id ipsum unigenito Deo esse proprium Evangelica testantur: cum "in principio erat verbum (John i. 1), et cum hoc apud Deum erat, et cum erat lumen "verum (ver. 9), et cum unigenitus Deus in sinu Patris est (ver. 18), et cum Jesus "Christus super omnia Deus est (Rom. ix. 5). 'Erat' igitur atque 'est,' quia ab eo "est, qui quod est semper est'. From this it will be perceived that Hilary's argument "rests wholly on the word 'est.'" [Notwithstanding this, however, the impression naturally derived from the passage is that Hilary is here put as distinctly quoting Joh. i. 18 (with the reading θεός) as Rom. ix. 5 immediately below. H. A.] "The expression "unigenitus Deus' is a favourite one with Hilary. It occurs in his treatise De "Trinitate about one hundred and four times." (Abbot, ut supra.) The following is Abbot's list of the seven places in which Hilary quotes the passage with the reading Filius: Tract. in Psalm. cxxxviii. cap. 35 [Migne, vol. i. p. 578]; De Trin. lib. ii. cap. 23 [Migne ii. 40]; lib. iv. capp. 8 [p. 76], 42 [p. 101]; lib. v. capp. 33, 34 [pp. 125, 126]; and lib. vi. cap. 39 [p. 163].

The concurrent testimony of Hippolytus, the Synodical epistle from Antioch, Eusebius, Athanasius, and apparently the whole of the Latin Fathers, is very strong. On the other side we have the Excerpta Theodoti, Epiphanius, Didymus, and perhaps Clement of Alexandria and the Synod of Ancyra A.D. 358.

THEODOTUS says, Joh. i. 1 is interpreted by the Valentinians thus: "ἀρχὴν μὲν γὰρ τὸν μονογενῆ λέγουσιν, ὃν καὶ θεὸν προσαγορεύουσι, ὡς καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἑξῆς ἀντιερὸς θεὸν αὐτὸν δηλοῖ λέγων Ὁ μονογενὴς θεός, ὁ ὢν εἰς τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρὸς, ὁ ἐκείνος ἐξηγήσατο." (Excerpta Theod. inter Opp. Clem. Alex. § 6, p. 958 P: but see Theod. § 9, p. 959.)

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, speaking of the difficulty of knowing God and of the impossibility of declaring God in words, brings forward Rom. xi. 33; 1 Cor. ii. 6, 7; Col. ii. 2, 3; Mt. xiii. 11; Ps. lxxvii.; and Matt. xiii. 33: having added quotations from Solon and Empedocles, he goes on: "καὶ Ἰωάννης ὁ ἀπόστολος θεὸν οὐδεὶς ἰώρακεν πώποτε ὁ μονογενὴς θεός, ὁ ὢν εἰς τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρὸς, ὁ ἐκείνος ἐξηγήσατο. τὸ δ' ἀόρατον καὶ ἀρρήτῳ, κόλπον ὀνομάσας θεοῖ. . . . τοῦ δὲ ἀγεννήτου οὐδὲν προὔπαρχει. λείπεται δὴ θεία χάρις καὶ μόνῃ τῇ παρ' αὐτὸν λόγῳ τὸ ἀγνωστον νοεῖν' καθὼ καὶ ὁ Λουκᾶς . . . Acts xvii. 22, 23." (Strom. v. pp. 695, 696 P.) The only other passage in which Clement quotes Joh. i. 18 is in "Quis dives salvetur," the opening words of ch. xxxvii., p. 946 P: Τι γὰρ ἐστὶ δεῖ θεῷ τὰ τῆς ἀγάπης μυστήρια; καὶ τότε ἐποπτεύσεις τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρὸς, ὃν ὁ μονογενὴς υἱὸς θεοῦ μόνος ἐξηγήσατο. It appears then that Clement knew of and used a reading or interpretation (it may be only the latter) of Joh. i. 18 which sanctioned the use of the term μονογενὴς θεός.

"EPIPHANIUS has quoted the "passage three times with the reading θεός. (Hær. lxx. cap. 5 [bis] p. 612, and lxx. cap. 7, p. 817.) In the remark, however, which follows the quotation in the first "passage, θεός and υἱός are interchanged:—καὶ φησι, Ὁ μονογενὴς θεός ὁ μὲν γὰρ λόγος ἐστὶν ἐκ πατρὸς γεννηθείς, ὁ πατὴρ δὲ οὐκ ἐγεννήθη διὰ τοῦτο μονογενὴς υἱός.

DIDYMUS has quoted the passage twice with the reading θεός. (De Trinit. lib. i. cap. 26, p. 393, and lib. ii. cap. 5, p. 495.) He also says ὁ υἱὸς κέκληται μονογενὴς θεός λόγος, καὶ εἰς κύριος Ἰησοῦς χριστός (lib. i. c. 15, p. 313). But here it "may be doubted whether a comma should be placed after μονογενὴς, or after θεός, or "after neither.

The SECOND (semi-arian) SYNOD OF ANCYRA may have read "θεός in Joh. i. 18, but the evidence is not decisive. After quoting Prov. viii. 22 &c., finds in this case a legitimate limit.

Hær. lxxiii. cap. 8, p. 854) “have no reason to suppose, a priori, that the reference to John is verbally accurate more than that to Proverbs, where we find neither the word νύον, nor the expression ἡ σοφία τοῦ σοφοῦ. It is not uncommon with the Fathers to give as the language of scripture, expressions formed from several passages combined, or which they regard as fully authorized by scripture though not occurring there in so many words.” (cf. supra.)

The evidence from Irenæus, Origen, Basil, and Cyril of Alexandria, is contradictory and uncertain. It is hardly possible to decide what was the reading of the copies known to IRENÆUS: he quotes the passage three times unigenitus Dei Hær. iii. 11. 6, p. 189, unigenitus Filius ib. iv. 20. 6, p. 255, unigenitus ib. iv. 20. 11, p. 256; in no case is either word absolutely inconsistent with the context; as far as Irenæus’ argument is concerned we might read ‘He who is the bosom of the Father hath declared Him.’ In the two first cases we have Filius in the immediate context; in the third, Verbum, though Filius Dei is not far off from the one hand, the translator may have conformed two of the quotations to the Latin version. On the other hand, had Irenæus read θεός, his subject (“seeing that he must almost have compelled him to give some distinct exposition of its bearing”) ORIGEN has θεός, In Joan. tom. ii. c. 29, vol. iv. p. 89, and lxxiii. c. 13, p. 104. In both [only the former in Migne] these passages, however, the very liberal version of Ferrari, made from a manuscript now lost, reads unigenitus alone, without Deus or Filius. On the other hand we have νύον, Contra Cels. lib. ii. c. 71 [p. 440] . . . So De la Rue and Lommatsch from two mss.; the earlier edition of Hoeschel founded on a single ms., instead of ὁ μονογενὴς νύον reads καὶ μὲν ὡς ὢν θεός. . . . Νύον τοῦ θεοῦ occurs In Joan. tom. vi. cap. 2, p. 102, as “by De la Rue and Lommatsch from the Bodleian ms., the earlier edn. of Huet, was founded on a single ms.; reads νύον θεός. A little after, in two allusions to the passage, ὁ μονογενὴς is used alone. BASIL . . . has θεός once, and in a passage mentions νύον ἀληθινός, μονογενὴς θεός, δύναμις θεοῦ, σοφία, and λόγος names given to Christ in Scripture; but he twice quotes the text in question as “the reading νύον. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, as edited by Aubert, has θεός three times, and νύον three times. His commentary on the passage, as printed, is “θεός, but its evidence is somewhat weakened by various readings.” (Abbot, ut supra.)

xiii. 23: for by this explanation confusion is introduced into the imagery, and the real depth of the truth hidden. The expression signifies, as Chrysostom observes, συγγένεια καὶ ἐνότης τῆς οὐσίας:—and is derived from the fond and intimate union of children and parents. The present participle, as in ch. iii. 13, is used to signify essential truth, without any particular regard to time. On the use of εἰς, see reff. It is not ‘put for’ ἐν: indeed it would be well for the student to bear in mind as a general rule, that no word or expression is ever ‘put for’ another: words are the index of thoughts, —and where an unusual construction is found, it points to some reason in the mind of the writer for using it, which reason is lost in the ordinary scholastic method of accounting for it by a put for that it is ‘put for’ some other. So here, εἰς τὸν κόσμον is not = ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, but is a carrying on of thought expressed in ver. 1, by πρὸς τὸν κόσμον: it is a pregnant construction involving in it the begetting of the Son of God, His being the λόγος of the Father, proceeding forth from God. It is a similar expression, on the side of His Unity with the Father, to ἐμὶ παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ, on the side of His manifestation to men. We find similar expressions, uniting the verb of generation with the preposition of motion, in ἐκ τῶν νεφελῶν, Od. δ. 61. εἰς ἀνάγκην μεθ’, Eur. Iph. V. ἐξηγιομαι, ἐξηγησις, and ἐξηγητής (Gen. xli. 8, 24), are technical terms used of the declaration of Divine matters. Wetstein has collected abundance of passages in illustration of this usage. See also Müller's Eumenides, Excursus D, on the ἐξηγηται. But Lücke (and I think rightly) believes it more in accordance with the simple style of John to take the word here in its ordinary, not its technical meaning. The object to be supplied after the verb is most likely αὐτόν, i. e. τὸν θεόν. De Wette thinks this too definite, and supplies 'that which He has seen,' as in ch. iii. 11. Lücke supplies τὴν χάριτα κ. ἀλ., as being 'that which He has seen'; but De Wette well observes that χάρις is more matter of revelation by act, than of ἐξηγήσεις. Euthymius's explanation, ἰδιδάξαν ὅτι θεὸν οὐδεὶς ἑώρακε πώποτε, is certainly wrong. See Matt. xi. 27.

19—23.] The first witness borne by John to Jesus: before the deputation from the Sanhedrim. 19.] αὕτη is the predicate, ἡ μαρτυρία the subject, in the present form of the sentence. So very frequently in St. John, where commonly the mistake is made of supposing the demonstrative pronoun to be the subject, whereas it is ever the predicate of identification. Euthym., αὕτη περὶ ἧς εἰπὼν μίλλαι προΐων, ἡ γενομένη δηλονότι ὅτι ἀπεστ. κ.τ.λ. of Ἰουδαίῳ] John alone of the Evangelists uses this expression;—principally as designating the chiefs of the Jewish people, the members of the Sanhedrim. It is an interesting enquiry, what this usage denotes as to the author or date of our Gospel. Prof. Bleek, Beiträge, pp. 245—249, has satisfactorily shewn that no inference can be deduced from it against the Jewish origin of the author, as Bretschneider and Fischer endeavoured to do: but it is rather confirmatory of the belief that the Gospel was written after the Jews had ceased to be politically a nation,—and among Gentiles;—the author himself contemplating those last as his readers.

ἔξ ἱερ.] does not belong to οἱ Ἰουδ.,—nor to ἱερ. κ. Λευ.,—but to ἀπισταίαν:—sent from Jerusalem priests, &c.: so ἑξαποστέλλω, Acts vii. 12; xi. 22 al. ἱερ. κ. Α.] This was a formal deputation;—priests and Levites, constituting the two classes of persons employed about the service of the temple (see Josh. iii. 3), are sent (Matt. xxi. 23) officially to enquire into the pretensions of the new Teacher (ver. 25), who had collected about him such multitudes (Matt. iii. 5), and had awakened popular expectation that he was the Messiah (Luke iii. 15).

σὺ τίς εἶ;] with reference to the popular doubts respecting him; asked in an unbelieving and inquisitorial spirit,—compare Matt. iii. 7 ff., which had already taken place. Even among the learned, as well as among the people, there were considerable differences as to the prophecies respecting the Messiah: see ch. vii. 40—52.

20.] ὠμολόγησεν, he openly and formally confessed. This emphatic notice of his declaration seems to be introduced not with any view of removing too high an estimate of John's work and office, as sometimes supposed, but rather to shew the importance of his testimony, which was so publicly and officially delivered,—that the Messiah was come (see ch. v. 33—35); and the way in which he depreciated himself in comparison with Him who came after him.

21.] σὺ οὖν τίς; equivalent to τίς λίγεις περὶ σεαυτοῦ; ver. 22. Ἥλίας εἶ;] The whole appearance of John reminded them of Elias:—see Matt. iii. 4, and compare 2 Kings i. 8. Besides, his announcement that the Kingdom of God was at hand, naturally led them to the prophecy Mal. iv. 5. Lightfoot cites from the Rabbinical books testimonies that the Jews expected a general purification or baptism before the coming of the Messiah (from Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 26, and Zech. xiii. 1), and that it would be administered by Elias.

κ. λ. Οὐκ εἰμί] The right explanation of this answer seems to be the usual one,—that the deputation asked the question in a mistaken and superstitious sense, meaning Elias bodily come down from heaven, who was expected to forerun and anoint the Messiah. (Our Lord seems to refer to the same extravagant notion in Matt. xi. 14, εἰ θέλετε δεῖξασθαι, αὐτός ἐστιν Ἡλ. ὁ μέλλων ἔρχεσθαι.) In this sense, John was not Elias; nor indeed in any other sense, was he Elias;—but only (Luke i. 17) ἐν πνεύματι καὶ δυνάμει Ἡλίου. ὁ πρ. εἶ σύ;] From the prophecy of Moses, Deut. xviii. 15, 18, the Jews expected some particular prophet to arise,—distinct from the Messiah (this distinction however was not held by all, see ch. vi. 14),—whose coming was, like that of Elias, intimately connected with that of the Messiah Himself: see ch. vii. 40, 41. In Matt. xvi. 14 we have ‘Jeremiah, or one of the prophets’ apparently = this expected prophet. There seem to have been various opinions about him;—all however agreeing in this, that he was to be one of the old prophets raised from the dead (see also 2 Macc. ii. 1—8). This John was not: and he therefore answers this also in the negative. 22.] Notice—they ever ask about his person: he ever refers them to his office. He is no one—a voice merely: it is the work of God, the testimony to Christ which is every thing. So the formalist ever in the church asks Who is he? while the witness for Christ only exalts, only cares for Christ’s work. 23.] These words, which by the other Evangelists are spoken of John as the fulfilment of the prophecy, appear from this place to have been first so used by himself. They introduce the great closing section of the prophecy of Isaiah (ch. xl.—lxvi.) so full of the rich promises and revelations of the Messiah and His kingdom.

εὐθύνετε is used as compendiously expressing ἐνομάσατε . . . εὐθύνετε ποιείτε.

By implication, the Baptist, quoting this opening prophecy of himself, announces the approaching fulfilment of the whole section.

24.] The reason of this explanation being added is not very clear. Lücke, with whom De Wette agrees, refers it to the apparent hostility of the next enquiry: but I confess I cannot see that it is more hostile than the preceding. Luthardt thinks that it imports, there were some ἀπεσταλμένοι present, who belonged to the sect of the Pharisees (ἦσαν δὲ καὶ ἐκ τῶν φαρι. ἀπεσταλμένοι), which the words will hardly bear: see below. Might it not be to throw light on their question about baptizing, as the Pharisees were the most precise about all ceremonies, lustrations, &c.? Origen makes this a new deputation: but he is plainly wrong: see the οὖν below. Euthymius gives another reason yet: ἐπιστήμηνατο καὶ τὴν αἵρεσιν αὐτῶν, ὑμφαίνων τὸ περιεργον τούτων καὶ σχολίων.

Abandoning the οἱ (see var. readd.), we must render, And they (i. e. the whole deputation) were (or had been) sent by the Pharisees; which will make it more probable that the explanation refers to the nature of the following question. ἀποστέλλομαι εἰς has occurred above, ver. 19, which gives additional probability to the reading of the text.

25.] On οὗτοι . . . οὗτοι, see note on ver. 13. This question shews probably that they did not interpret Isa. xl. 3 of any herald of the Messiah. They regarded baptism as a significant token of the approach of the Messianic Kingdom, and they asked, 'Why baptizest thou, if thou art no forerunner of the Messiah?' 26, 27.] [δ] ὁπίσω μου ἐρχ. is the subject of the sentence; He that cometh after me, &c., stands among you. The insertions (see var. readd.) have been made by some one not aware of this, and wishing to square the verse with vv. 15, 30. The answer of the Baptist seems not to correspond to the question in ver. 25. This was noticed as early as Heracleon (Origen in Joan. tom. vi. 15, vol. iv. p. 131), who said, ἀποκρίνεται δ' Ἰωάννης τοῖς εἰς τῶν Φαρισαίων πεμφθεῖσιν, οὐ πρὸς δ' ἐκείνους ἰκηρώσω, ἀλλ' ὁ αὐτὸς ἰβούλειτο. This however is impugned at some length by Origen, but not on very convincing grounds. The truth seems to have been apprehended by Olshausen,—that the declaration of John that the Messiah was standing among them at that moment unknown to them, was an answer to their question demanding a legitimization of his prophetic claims;—a σημείον that he was sent from God:—see ch. ii. 18. Olsh. also suggests that this may clear up the saying of the Jews in ch. x. 41 (see note there). In repeating this saying at other times (see Matt. iii. 11 and ||), the Baptist plainly states of the Messiah, that he should baptize them with the Holy Ghost (and fire), as here in ver. 33. Here, in speaking to those learned in the offices of the Messiah, he leaves that to be supplied. λύσω αὐτοῦ τ. ἱμ. . .] See note on Matt. iii. 11. 28.] The common reading Βηθαβαρά, is owing to a conjecture of Origen, the grounds of which he thus states:—ὅτι μὲν σχεδὸν ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς ἀντιγράφοις κτείνεται ταῦτα ἐν Βηθανίᾳ ἐγένετο" οὐκ ἀγνοούμεν, καὶ εἴκοις τοῦτο καὶ ἐπὶ πρότερον γεινόμεναι· καὶ παρὰ Ἡρακλείωνι γούν Βηθανίαν ἀνέγνωμεν. ἐκείσθημεν δὲ μὴ δεῖν Βηθανίᾳ ἀναγινώσκειν, ἀλλὰ Βηθαβαρά, γινόμενοι ἐν τοῖς τόποις ἐπὶ ἱστορίαν τῶν ἱχνῶν Ἰησοῦ καὶ τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ καὶ τῶν προφητῶν. Βηθανία τόπος ἐστὶν περὶ τὸν Ἰορδάνην δείκνυσθαι δὲ λέγουσι παρὰ τῇ ὁχθῇ τοῦ Ἰορδάνου τὰ Βηθαβαρὰ, ἔνθα ἰστοροῦσι τὸν Ἰωάννην βεβαπτίζειν (in Joan. vi. 24, p. 140). He goes on to shew from the etymology of the names that it must have been Bethabara; an argument which modern criticism will not much esteem. It will be seen that his testimony is decisive for the universality and authority of Βηθανία, while for the other he only produces a tradition, and that only at second-hand; 'they say that such a place is shewn.' That no Bethany beyond Jordan was known in his time proves but little;—for 300 eventful years had changed the face of Palestine since these events, and the names and sites of many obscure places may have been forgotten. I abstain from enumerating modern conjectures on the identity of the two, or the etymology of the names, as being indecisive and unprofitable. The objection of Paulus, that πῖραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου the Sanhedrim had no authority, appears not to be founded in fact: see Lücke's Comm. i. 394 ff. The question whether this testimony of the Baptist is identical with that given by the three other Evangelists, especially by Luke (iii. 16), is, after all that has been said on it (Lücke, De Wette, Olshausen, &c.), not of great importance. The whole series of transactions here recorded, from ver. 15 onwards, certainly happened after the baptism of our Lord;—for before that event John did not know Him as ὁ ἐρχόμενος: and μίσος θυμῶν στήκει ver. 26 shews that he had so recognized Him (see below on τῇ ἑπαύρ.): whereas the testimony in Luke iii. 16 and ||, is as certainly given before the baptism. But since the great end of John's mission was to proclaim Him who was coming after him, it is not only probable, but absolutely necessary to suppose, that he should have delivered this testimony often, and undervarying circumstances: before the baptism, in the form given by Luke, ἐρχεται ὁ λεχυσ. μου κ.τ.λ., and after it in this form, οὗτος ἦν ὃν ἔλεγον (ver. 15), where his former testimony is distinctly referred to. And among John's disciples and the multitudes who frequented his baptism, many reports of such his sayings would naturally be current. So there is neither a real nor even an apparent contradiction between John and the other Evangelists. It is a far more important question, in what part of the narrative the forty days' Temptation is to be inserted. From ver. 19 to ch. 2 there is an unbroken sequence of days distinctly marked. Since then ver. 19 is understood as happening after the baptism, it must have happened after the Temptation also. And in this supposition there is not the slightest difficulty, when we have made it, it still remains to say whether at that time our Lord returned from the Temptation or not. The general opinion of Harmonists has been, that the approach of Jesus to the baptism in ver. 29 was His return after the Temptation. But this I think questionable account of the μίσος θυμῶν στήκει ver. 26; which I can only understand like I therefore believe that the return to the Temptation to Bethany beyond Jordan had taken place before the Baptist arrived.

29—34.] Second witness borne by to Jesus: apparently before His baptism. 29.] τῇ ἑπαύριον, the day after. Those who wish to introduce the Temptation between vv. 28 and 29, interpret it, 'on some day after.' Thus Euthymius τῇ ἐπ., μετὰ τὴν ἀπὸ ἱρήμου καὶ αὐτοῦ ἀφ' οὐρανόθεν. But this sense of τ although certainly found in the L² see Gen. xxx. 33,—is not according to the usage of John (see reff.), and would be quite alien from the precision of this portion of the narrative, which, ver. 29 specifies even the hours of the day and understand it therefore literally, both in vv. 35 and 44. ἐρχ. π. It is not said whence, or why, or for what for the purpose of an interview, or not fact merely is related, for the sake of a testimony which follows. I mention these because on these points difficulties have been raised. Ἴδε ὁ ἄμν. τ. θ.] is one of the most important and difficult sayings in the N. meaning of the following words, ὁ αἶψον τὴν ἀμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου. (α) The title must refer to some known and particular lamb, and cannot be a mere figure for a just and holy man, as Kuinoel and Gabler suppose. It is inconceivable, that ὁ ἀμνός τοῦ θεοῦ should, in a testimony so precise and formal as this of the Baptist, be nothing but an hyperbole, and that one wholly unprecedented, and to his hearers unintelligible. Had no doctrinal considerations been at stake, we may safely say that this interpretation would never have been proposed. In its bearing on the latter clause of the verse, it is equally untenable. These interpreters make ὁ αἶψον ἡ ἀμ. τ. κόσ. to mean, 'qui pravitatem hominum per vitam suam graviter quidem etsi innocens experietur, sed agni instar mala sibi inflicta patiente et mansueto animo sustinebit' (Gabler); or, 'Hic removebit peccata hominum, i. e. pravitatem e terra.' The first of these meanings of αἶψον is altogether without example:—that cited from 1 Macc. xiii. 17, not being applicable. The second, though common enough in other connexions, is never found with ἀμαρτίαν: see reff. The common-sense account of this part of the matter is:—John wished to point out Jesus as the Messiah: he designates Him as the Lamb of God; he therefore referred to some definite lamb,—revealed by God, sent by God, pleasing to God, or in some meaning especially, τοῦ θεοῦ. Whence did this idea come? (β) Can John have referred to the paschal lamb? Further than the very use of the name brings in with it the general typical use of the animal, and thus this particular use may lie in the background, I think not,—and for this reason;—The dominant idea in the paschal sacrifice has no connexion, in any sense of the words, with αἶψον τὴν ἀμαρτίαν. However by the light now thrown back on it since the Spirit has opened the things of Christ, we discern this typical meaning in the sprinkling of the blood (see 1 Cor. v. 7),—in the Jewish mind, no mention being made of sin or the removing of sin in any connexion with the paschal lamb, the two could not be brought forward, in such an announcement as this, in close connexion with one another. (γ) Can the reference be to the lamb of the daily morning and evening sacrifice? or to the sacrificial lamb generally? With the same reservation as above, I think not: for (1) this expression is too definite to have so general and miscellaneous a reference; (2) of many animals which were used for sacrifice, the lamb was only one, and that one not by any means so prominent as to serve as a type for the whole; and (3) the lamb (with only two exceptions, Levit. iv. 32; Num. vi. 14, in both which cases it was to be a female, as if for express distinction from the ordinary use of the lamb) was never used for a sin-offering, properly so called and known. The question is not, whether Christ be not typified by all these offerings, which we now know to be the case (1 Pet. i. 19 al.), but whether the Baptist is likely to have referred to them in such words as these.

(δ) There remains but one reference, and that is, to the prophetic announcement in Isa. liii. 7. The whole of that latter section of Isaiah, as before remarked on ver. 23, is Messianic, and was so understood by the Jews (see my Hulsean Lectures for 1841, pp. 62—66). We have there the servant of God (= the Messiah) compared to a lamb brought to the slaughter (liii. 7), and it is said of Him (ib. ver. 4), οὗτός τας ἀμαρτίας ἡμῶν φέρει καὶ περὶ ἡμῶν ὀδυνᾶται—ver. 5, αὐτός δι' ἐρανυματισθῆ διὰ τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἡμῶν—ver. 6, καὶ κύριος παρίδωκεν αὐτὸν ταῖς ἀμαρτίαις ἡμῶν—ver. 8, αἰρεται ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς ἡ ζωὴ αὐτοῦ, ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνομιῶν τοῦ λαοῦ μου ἤχθη εἰς θάνατον—ver. 12, καὶ αὐτὸς ἀμαρτίας πολλὰν ἀνήνεγκε καὶ διὰ τὰς ἀνομίας αὐτῶν παρίδόθη. So that here, and here only, we have the connexion of which we are in search,—between the lamb, and the bearing or taking away of sin,—expressly stated, so that it could be formally referred to in a testimony like the present. And I have therefore no doubt that this was the reference.

(ε) We have now to enquire into the specific meaning of ὁ αἶψον τὴν ἀμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου (see above under [α]). αἶψον answers to the Heb. מָרִץ, which is used frequently in the O. to have almost been adopted as such, the actual compound ἀπαίρειν being intransitive) is used in the sense of 'taking away of sin and its guilt,' but taking it away by expiation: see Exod. xxxiv. 7; Levit. x. 17; Num. xiv. 18. The word in our verse will bear either of these meanings, or both conjoined; for if the Lamb is to suffer the burden of the sins of the world, and to take away sin and its guilt by expiation, this result must be accomplished by the offering of Himself. But (2) it is objected, that this view of a suffering Messiah and of expiation by the sufferings of one, was alien from the Jewish expectations;—and that the Baptist (see Matt. xi. 2 ff. and note) cannot himself have had any such view. But the answer to this may be found in the fact that the view, though not generally prevalent among the Jews, was by no means unknown to many. The application by the early Jewish expositors of Isa. liii. to the Messiah, could hardly have been made, without the idea of the suffering and death of their Messiah being presented to their minds. The same would be the case in the whole sacrificial œconomy:—the removal of guilt (which was universally ascribed to the Messiah) by suffering and death would be familiarized to their minds. Traces of this are found in their own writings. In 2 Macc. vii. 37, 38, the last of the seven brethren thus speaks before his martyrdom: ἐγὼ δὲ καθάπερ οἱ ἀδελφοί μου καὶ σῶμα καὶ ψυχὴν προδίδωμι περὶ τῶν πατριῶν νόμων, ἐπικαλούμενος τὸν θεὸν ἵλεων ταχὺ τῷ ἔθνει γενέσθαι, καὶ σὲ μετὰ ἑτασμῶν καὶ μαρτύρων ἑξομολογήσασθαι, διότι μόνος αὐτὸς θεὸς ἔστιν. ἐν ἐμοὶ δὲ καὶ τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς μου στήναι τὴν τοῦ παντοκράτορος δόξην τὴν ἐπὶ τὸ σῶμα καὶ ἡμῶν γένος δικαίως ἐπηγμένην. And Josephus de Maccab. § 17 (4 Macc. xvii. 22), says of these same martyrs, that they were ὥσπερ ἀντίψυχον τῆς τοῦ ἰδνους ἀμαρτίας. καὶ διὰ τοῦ αἵματος τῶν εὐσεβῶν ἱκύνων καὶ [τοῦ] ἱλαστηρίου τοῦ θανάτου αὐτῶν ἡ θεία πρόνοια τὸν Ἰσραὴλ προκακωθέντα δίδωσι. The whole history of the sacrifices and devotions of the heathen world abounds with examples of the same idea variously brought forward; and to these the better-informed among the Jews could be no strangers. And as to the Baptist himself, we must not forget that the power of the Holy Spirit which enabled him to baptize by a special sign the Redeemer spoke in him, and therefore his baptism would not be the result of education merely, or his own reasoning, but of some kind of intuitive perception of divine truth, which those have had who have been for any special purpose the organs of the Holy Ghost. And as regards Matt. xi. 3, the doubt on the mind of John there expressed does not appear to have touched at all on the matter in question,—but to have rather been a question of expressing his impatience at the slow and quiet progress of Him of whom he expected greater things and a more rapid public manifestation. See the whole enquiry pursued at greater length in Lücke's Commentary, vol. i. pp. 441, 6, from whence the substance of the note is taken. 30.] See on ver.

31.] On the apparent discrepancy between this statement, οὐκ ᾔδειν αὐτόν, and St. Matthew's narrative, I have stated my view on Matt. iii. 14. Both accounts are entirely consistent with the supposition that John had been from youth upwards acquainted with our Lord, indeed may have in his own mind believed Him to be the Christ:—but his (ver. 33) a special sign appointed him which to recognize Him as such,—that sign was given, he, like the rest of the people (καὶ γὰρ, I also, see ver. 26), had certain knowledge of Him. Lücke's note proceeds upon the unworthy view of the historical character of the Gospel which his school has adopted. The same may be said of Neander, Leben Jesu 86 ff.

De Wette gives the sense of 'This testimony (ver. 30) does not upon this long personal acquaintance with Him, but on that which happened during my work of baptizing.'

Ἀλλ' ἔτι Justin Martyr represents Trypho the saying, χριστὸς δὲ εἰ καὶ γιγνόμεναι, ἔστι πῶς, ἀγνωστὸς ἔστι, καὶ οὐδὲ αὐτὸν ἐπίσταται, οὐδὲ ἔχει δύναντα, μέχρις ἂν ἰδῶν ἡλίαν χριστὸν αὐτὸν καὶ φανερὸν πᾶσι ποιήσῃ, p. 110. But our narrative is not founded upon any such Jewish belief, for it is evidently only as a spiritual preparation through repentance, for the knowledge of Him, that John regarded his baptism Coherrentibus Baptistæ verbis Evangelista quasi parenthesin interponit: καὶ μαρτύρησεν Ἰωάννης λέγων.’ Bengel. The occurrence related by John happened at the baptism of Jesus, which is therefore here pre-supposed as known. Although this has been questioned (Usteri, Nachrichten über den Täufer J. u.s.w., cited by Lücke i. 423), I cannot see how it can be reasonably doubted. We cannot surely suppose that such a sign was twice shewn. On the appearance itself, see note Matt. iii. 16. The account here given confirms the view which I have there maintained, that the appearance was confined to our Lord and the Baptist: he was to receive the sign, and then to testify to the others, who were not themselves yet the bearers, but the recipients of testimony:—κατὰ τινὰ πνευματικὴν θεωρίαν ὥσθην μόνῃ τῷ Ἰωάννῃ. Theod. Mops. p. 736.

τεθεῖσθαι, perf. I have seen, in reference to the sign divinely intimated to him, in the abiding fulfilment of which he now stood. So again below, ver. 34. ἔμεινεν ἐπ’ αὐτόν.] By some appearance which is not described, the Holy Spirit was manifested to John as not removing from Jesus again, but abiding on Him. But we are not to understand that he had seen the Spirit descending on others, and not abiding; for (see ch. vii. 39; Acts i. 5; xix. 2 ff.) the gift of the Holy Spirit did not ordinarily accompany John’s baptism, but only in this one case; and its occurrence was to point out to him the Messiah.

οὗτος ἐστ. ὁ β. ἐν πν. ἁγ.] Here again we seem to have a reference to the synoptic cycle of narratives, for our Evangelist has not before mentioned this office of the Messiah. 34.] A solemn reiteration of his testimony, after the mention of the giving of this token by Him who sent him;—And I have seen (accordingly) &c. The token must have been given to the Baptist by a special revelation, which also revealed to him his own errand and office; so Luke iii. 2, ἐγίνετο ῥῆμα θεοῦ ἐπὶ Ἰωάννῃν τὸν Ζαχ. υἱὸν ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ.

ἐμαρτύρηκα is stronger than μαρτυρῶ—I have seen (on the perf. see above ver. 32) and have borne testimony—it is a reference to his testimony at the time, as a thing on record in his memories, and as still continuing. δ vl. τ. 0.] See ver. 18 = the λόγος made flesh, the Messiah. On the import of the descent of the Spirit on Jesus at His baptism, those who can do so should consult Lücke’s very able Excursus, i. 433—443. In this commentary, see notes on Luke ii. 41—52. I may just remark, that the Personal Logos, Who σάρξ ἐγένετο in our Lord, and was subjected to all the laws of human development in infancy, childhood, youth,—evermore in an especial degree under the leading of the Holy Spirit, by whose agency the Incarnation had taken place,—was the Recipient (τὸ δεχόμενον) of this fulness of the indwelling of the Holy Ghost: and that herein consisted the real depth and propriety of this sign;—the abiding of the Spirit without measure (ch. iii. 34) on Him indicated beyond doubt that He was the λόγος σάρξ γεγενῶς,—for no mere human intelligence could be thus receptive of the Holy Spirit of God;—we receive Him only from this last circumstance, certainly would have been named, had not the name been suppressed for some especial reason, we are justified in inferring that it was the Evangelist himself. And such has been the general opinion. Euthymius gives an alternative which is hardly probable: ἡ διότι οὐκ ἦν τῶν ισισημων καὶ γνωριμων ἑκείνος, ὃς αὐτὸς ἦν ὁ ταῦτα γράφων. ⁴³ [Ἰδιον] not merely 'for the possessive pronoun' (according to Winer, § 22, 7), but referring to πρῶτον, and furnishing a reason for it.

μεσσίαν] = Γεφ² = not ὁ χριστός, but χριστός: being the identification simply of the two words, not here of the two titles. ⁴³] This is evidently the first bestowal of the new name on Simon: and it is done from our Lord's prophetic knowledge of his future character; see note on Matt. xvi. 18. Κηφᾶς = ܡܦܐ Aramaic, ܡܦܐ Hebrew, a stone. The Greek name Peter became the prevalent one in the apostolic Church very soon: Paul uses both names indiscriminately. I own I cannot but think with Bengel, Paulus, and Strauss, that the knowledge of Simon shewn by the Lord is intended to be miraculous. So also Stier, i. 31 f. edn. 2, "I know who and what thou art from thy birth till thy present coming to me. . . . I name thee, I give thee a new name, I know what I will make of thee in thy following of Me and for my Kingdom." The emphatic use of εμβλεψας here (it is not so emphatic in ver. 36, but still even there may imply fixed contemplation, in the power of the Spirit, who suggested the testimony) is hardly accountable except on this explanation of supernatural knowledge. Similarly Abram, Sara, Jacob, received new names in reference to the covenant and promises of God to them.

^{44—52}] The calling of Philip and Nathanael. τῇ ἐπαύριον.] Apparently, the day after the naming of Peter; and if so, the next but one after the visit of Andrew and the other disciple, and the fourth day after ver. 19. Our Lord is on the point of setting out from the valley of the Jordan to Galilee, and finds Philip, with whom there is every reason to believe He was previously acquainted (see ver. 45). Here we find Jesus himself calling a disciple, for the first time. But ἀκολουθεῖ does not here bear its strict apostolic sense; the εὐρέκαμεν afterwards, and the going to search for others to be disciples, unites Philip to the company of those who have been before mentioned, who we know were not immediately or inseparably attached as followers to Jesus.

46.] It does not appear where Nathanael was found: but he is described, ch. xxi. 2, as ὁ ἀπὸ Κανᾶ τῆς Γαλιλαίας: and as we find Jesus there, ch. ii. 1, it is probable the call may have taken place in its neighbourhood. Nathanael ("ἡγῆ, i. q. Θεόδωρος, gift of God." Wordsw.) is mentioned only in these two places. From them we should gather that he was an apostle; and as his name is nowhere found in the catalogues of the twelve, but Philip is associated in three of them, Matt. x. 3: Mark iii. 18: Luke vi. 14, with Bartholomew, it has been supposed that Nathanael and Bartholomew were the same person (see note on Matt. x. 3). This is however mere conjecture.

Μωυσῆς ἐν τ. v.] probably in Deut. xviii. 15; but also in the promises to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 7 al.: and in the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 10, and the prophets, passim; see the reff. in E. V.

τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Ἰωσ. τ. ἀπὸ N.] This expression seems to shew previous acquaintance on the part of Philip with Jesus. No stress can be laid, as has been most unfairly done by Lücke, De Wette, and others, on Jesus being called by Philip, the son of Joseph, as indicating that the history of His birth and childhood, as related by Matt. and Luke, was unknown to John. Philip expresses what was the prevailing belief, in the ordinary words, as Olshausen remarks. In an admirable note, Leben Jesu, p. 23 ff., Neander remarks, that by combining the two declarations of John, that in Jesus the Eternal Word of God became flesh (ver.

14), and that 'that which is born of flesh is flesh' (ch. iii. 6), we can escape the inference, that a supernatural working of God in the conception of Man Christ Jesus is implied.

47.] As Lücke observes, the meaning this question is simpler than at first s appears. It is impossible that Nathanael himself a Galilean, could speak from feeling of contempt for Galilee generally and we have no evidence that Nazareth was held in contempt among the Galileans. He alluded therefore to the smallness and insignificance of the town in proportion to the great things which were now predicted of it. Nazareth is never named in the O. T. nor in Josephus.

48.] Evangelist certainly intends a supernatural insight by the Lord into Nathanael's character to be here understood; and then probably no reference at all to the question which Nathanael had just asked. suppose that Jesus overheard that question, is just one of those perfectly gratuitous assumptions which the very Commentators who here make this supposition are usually the first to blame. Comp. ch. ii. 25.

Ἀληθ. Ἰσρ.] 'An Israel who truly answers to the inner honourable meaning of the name.' We reflect what was contained in that name, and Who it is that speaks, we hardly agree with De Wette that the words are spoken merely in the spirit which every nation attaches some peculiar virtue, and especially those of openness and straightforwardness, to itself, 'deutsch herauszusagen,' 'deutsch zu reden' or Cicero's 'Romano more loqui.' Our Lord probably referred to Ps.

perfect knowledge of his character. The question πῶς μ. γιν. is one of astonishment, but not perhaps yet of suspicion of any thing supernatural. Our Lord's answer first opens this to him. πρὸ latter construction.

The whole form
of our Lord's answer seems to indicate that the place where Philip called Nathanael was not now in sight, nor had been.
The declaration that Jesus had seen him there, at once brings the conviction which he expresses in the next verse. This would not have been the case, unless the sight had been evidently and unquestion-ably supernatural: and unless the words ὄντα ὑπὸ τὴν συκὴν involved this. Had Jesus merely seen Nathanael without being seen by him, (De Wette,) or had εἶδόν σε only expressed 'I knew thy character,' at first sight, 'although at a distance' (Lücke), no such immediate conviction would have followed. ὄντα ὑπὸ τὴν συκὴν, says Wordsw., "is something more than ὑπὸ τῇ συκῇ—the accusative indicates retirement thither as well as concealment there,—perhaps for purposes of prayer and meditation." In fact it contains in it, 'when thou wentest under the fig-tree, and while thou wert there.'

that δ. υἱ. τ. θ. was not a Jewish appella-blasphemous to them, ἰγὼ κ. ὁ πατήρ ἔν ἐσμεν,—that they wished to stone Him; see note on ch. x. 36. It was certainly not so common a name as 'the Son of David,' for the Messiah. Nathanael can hardly have meant the name in other than its popular meaning; and the synonymous and better known appellation which he adds, confirms this.

51.] Our Lord
says this not in blame, rather in praise of the simple and honest expression of Nathanael's conviction; but principally to shew him, that if he believed by reason of this comparatively small proof of His divine power, his faith would increase from strength to strength at the greater proofs which should from that time forward be given.

It is perhaps best to set a question at πιστεύεις; but see notes on the similar sentences, ch. xvi. 31, and
ch. xx. 29.

52.] ἀμὴν ἀμὴν is peculiar to John. The other Evangelists use ἀμὴν once only in such asseverations.
The LXX do not use it in this sense.
Stier remarks (i. 36, edn. 2), that the Verily, verily, I say unto you of the Lord, is spoken in His coequality with the Father: not as the 'Thus saith the Lord' of the prophets.

ὑμῖν] The words
following are then spoken to all the disciples present, not only to Nathanael.

With or without ἀπ' ἀπρὶ, the meaning will be much the same. The glories of a period beginning from the opening of the Lord's public ministry, and at this day not yet completed, are described. For it is not the outward visible opening of the material heavens, nor ascent and descent of angels in the sight of men, which our Lord here announces; but the series of glories which was about to be unfolded in His Person and Work from that time forward. Luther, cited by Lücke, i. 458, beautifully says: "When Christ became man and had entered on His ministerial office and begun to preach, then was the heaven opened, and remains open; and has from that time, since the baptism of Christ in the Jordan, never been shut, and never will be shut, although we do not see it with our bodily eyes . . . Christ says this: 'Ye are now heavenly citizens, and have your citizenship above in the heavenly Jerusalem, and are in communion with the holy angels, who shall without intermission ascend and descend about you.'"

The opening of heaven is a symbolical expression, signifying the imparting of divine grace, help, and revelation. See Gen. xxviii. 10—17: Ezek. i. 1: Isa. vi. 1: Mal. iii. 10: Isa. lxiv. 1: also Deut. xi. 17: 1 Kings viii. 35. The words have a plain reference to the ladder of Jacob, and imply that what he then saw was now to receive its fulfilment: that He, the Son of Man, was the dwelling of God and the gate of Heaven, and that through Him, and on Him in the first place, was to descend all communication of help and grace from above. That no allusion is meant to the Transfiguration, or the Agony, is plain; for all those here addressed did not witness these appearances, but Peter and John only; nor to the Ascension, for they did not see heaven opened, nor did angels ascend nor descend.

The above has (remarks Olah. ii. 79) been the interpretation of all Commentators of any depth in all times: Origen as well as Augustine, Luther as well as Calvin, Lücke as well as Tholuck: and I may add, De Wette as well as Stier. τὸν υἱ. τ. ἀνθ.] An expression originally (as appears) derived, in its Messianic sense, from Dan. vii. 13, 14, and thenceforward used as one of the titles of the Messiah (see ch. xii. 34). κ. αὶ μαθ. αὐτ.] It does not appear who these were, unless we assume that they were those called in ch. i., which seems most probable. John himself was most likely present. He does not relate so circumstantially any thing which he had not witnessed.

In this case, there must have been some other reason for the invitation, besides mere previous acquaintance. This would be the probable reason for Jesus himself being invited; but the disciples, being from various places in the district, can hardly all have been (De Wette) friends of the family. The fact of Jesus having attached disciples to Himself must have been known, and they were doubtless invited from consideration to Him.

Our Lord at once opens
 His ministry with the character which He gives of himself Matt. xi. 18, 19, as distinguished from the asceticism of John.
 He also, as Trench admirably remarks (Miracles, edn. 2, p. 98, note), gives us his own testimony against the tendency which our indolence ever favours, of giving up those things and occasions to the world and the devil, which we have not Christian boldness to mingle in and purify. Even Cyprian, for instance, proscribes such festivals,—nuptiarum festa improba et con- vivias lascivias vitentur, quorum periculosa contagio est. De Habitu Virginum, ch.
 xxi. p. 460. And such is the general verdict of modern religionism, which would keep the heaven distinct from the lump, for fear it should become unleavened.

The especial honour conferred upon mar- riage by the Lord should also be noticed.
 "He here adorned and beautified it with his presence, and first miracle that He wrought."

3.] There is no necessity to suppose that the feast had lasted several days, as De Wette and Lücke do.
 It has been suggested that the unexpected presence of the disciples may have occasioned a failure in the previously sufficient supply: a gloss in the old latin cod. Rhedigerianus has, 'et factum est per multam turbam vocatorum vinum con-summari.'

The mother of Jesus evidently is in a position of authority (see ver. 5) in the house, which was probably that of a near relative. The conjectures and traditions on the subject are many,

 but wholly unsatisfactory.

A graver
 question arises as to the intent with which this οἶνον οὐκ ἔχ. was said. She cannot have had from experience any reason to suppose that her Son would work a miracle, for this (ver. 11) was His first.
 Chrysostom suggests (so also Theophyl., Euthym., and Neander, L. J. p. 271) that, knowing Him to be Who He was, she had been by the recent divine acknowledgment of Him and His calling disciples to Himself, led to expect the manifestation of His Messianic power about this time; and here seemed an occasion for it. Some of the other explanations are: 'that she had always found Him a wise counsellor, and mentioned the want to Him merely that He might suggest some way of remedying it.' Cocceius, cited by Trench.
 'Velim discedas, ut ceteri item discedant, antequam penuria patefias.' Bengel. 'Ut pia aliqua exhortatione convivis tedium eximeret, ac simul levaret pudorem sponsal.' Calvin, cited by Lücke. 'Jesus had wrought miracles, but in secret, before this.' Tholuck.

On the whole, the
 most probable explanation is that of Lücke, which somewhat modifies the first here mentioned,—that our Lord Himself had recently given some reason to expect that He would shew forth His glory by wonderful works. So, very nearly, Stier, R. J.
 i. 38, edn. 2.

4.] The answer of our Lord is beyond question one of reproof, and disclaimer of participation in the grounds on which the request was made.
 See instances, besides ref., in Josh. xxii.
 24: Mark i. 24. And so all the early expositors understood it. Irenæus (iii.
 16. 6, p. 206) says, 'Dominus repellens

 λατὴν λαμπροτέραν ποιῆσαι διὰ τοῦ

 The Romanist expositors mostly endeavour to divest the answer of any aspect of rebuke, and maintain that it was so uttered for our sakes alone, to teach us that He did not perform His miracles from regard to human affinity, but solely from love and His object of manifesting their cavils with just one remark,—that He who creates abundance enough in this earth to “put temptation in men’s way,” acted on this occasion analogously with His known method of dealing. We may answer an error on the other side (if it be on the other side), by saying, that the Lord here most effectually and once for all stamps with His condemnation that false system of moral reformation, which would commence by pledges to abstain from intoxicating liquors. He pours out His bounty for all, and He vouchsafes His grace to each for guidance; and to endeavour to evade the work which He has appointed for each man,—by refusing the bounty, to save the trouble of seeking the grace, is an attempt which must ever end in degradation of the individual motives, and in social demoralization,—whatever present apparent effects may follow its first promulgation. One visible sign of this degradation, in its intellectual form, is the miserable attempt made by some of the advocates of this movement, to shew that the wine here and in other places of Scripture is unfermented wine, not possessing the power of intoxication.

The filling with water, and drawing out wine, is all that is related. ‘The moment of the miracle,’ says Lücke, ‘is rather understood than expressed. It seems to lie between vv. 7 and 8’ (i. 471). The process of it is wholly out of the region of our imagination. In order for wine to be produced, we have the growth and ripening of the grape; the crushing of it in proper vessels; the fermentation;—but here all these are in a moment brought about in their results, by the same Power which made the laws of nature, and created and unfolded the capacities of man. See below on ver. 11.

8.] The ἀρχιτρίκλινος (συμποσιαρχος, ἐπιμαλητής τοῦ συμποσίου, Euthym.) seems to be the same with the ἡγούμενος spoken of, Sir. xxxv. (xxxii.) 1, and with the Latin rex, or magister, convivi. It would seem (from Sir. l. c.) that he was one of the guests raised to the post of presiding over the arrangements of the feast. This is however doubted by the older Commentators (Severus in the Catena, Lücke, i. 472), who make him not one of the guests, but a person holding this especial office, and attending on feasts. Here, he tastes the wine; and therefore probably was a guest himself. Lücke quotes from Petronius ‘triclinaryarches.’ 9. οἱ ἡντληκότες] This is the participle of the pluperf. (as well as of the perf.), and is here to be so rendered—who had drawn the water.

10.] The saying of the ἀρχ. is a general one, not applicable to the company then present. We may be sure that the Lord would not have sanctioned, nor ministered to, actual drunkenness. Only those who can conceive this, will find any difficulty here; and they will find difficulties every where. The account of the practice referred to is, that the palates of men become after a while dull, and cannot distinguish between good wine and bad. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xiv. 18) speaks of persons ‘qui etiam convivis (vina) alia quam sibi metipsis ministrant, aut procedente mensa subiciunt.’ But the practice here described is not precisely that of which Pliny speaks, nor is there any meanness to be charged on it: it is only that, when a man has some kinds of wine choicer than others, he naturally

With regard to the word μεθύσθαι, while there is no reason here to press its ordinary meaning, so neither is there any to shrink from it, as uttered by the ἀρχιτραπεζίτης. 11.] Without the article before ἀρχὴν (see rec. in digest) it is this wrought Jesus as the beginning of his miracles:—ἀρχὴ being the predicate.

This assertion of John excludes all the apocryphal miracles of the Gospel of the Infancy, and such like works, from credit.

σημεῖον, which occasionally occurs in the other Gospels and the Acts in this absolute sense of a miracle (see reff.), is St. John's ordinary word for it. Cf. Luthardt, p. 62.

τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ.] The glory, namely, which is referred to in ch. i. 14, where see note. It was a miracle eminently shewing forth the glory of the λόγος, δι' οὗ πάντα ἐγένετο, in His state of having become flesh. And this 'believing on Him,' here predicated of the disciples, was certainly a higher faith than that which first led them to Him. They obtained new insight into His power:—not yet reflectively, so as to infer what all this implied, but so as to increase their faith and trust in Him. Again and again 'they believed': new degrees of faith being attained; just as this has since been the case, and will continue to be, in the Church, in the continual providential development of the Christian spirit,—the leavening of the whole lump by degrees.

This important miracle, standing as it does at the very entrance of the official life of Christ, has been the subject of many doubts, and attempts to get rid of, or explain away, the power which was here manifested. But never did a narrative present a more stubborn inflexibility to the writers of Scripture:—never was simple historical veracity more strikingly stamped on any miracle than on this. doubtless this is providentially so arranged to see the objections to it treated, and admirable concluding remarks, in Luke i. 478. To those who yet seek some sufficient cause for the miracle being wrought we may—besides the conclusive answer we are not in a position to treat this question satisfactorily,—assign the unmistakable spiritual import of the change made, as indicating the general nature of the beneficent work which the Lord does on earth to do. So Cornelius a Lapide (Trench, p. 113, edn. 2, note): 'Christi initio sue prædicationis mutans aqua vinum significabat se legem Moysi instar aquae insipidam et frigidam, versurum in Evangelium gratiæ quasi star vini est, generosa, sapida, ardens efficac.' Similarly Eusebius, Augustin, Bernard, and Gregory the Great. 13—22.] The first official visit to Jerusalem, at a Passover: and cleansing of the Temple. 13.] No data are given to determine whether the reason of the short stay at Capernaum was the near approach of the Passover. Nothing is said of those who accompanied Jesus: but at all events, His already called disciples would be with Him (see ver. 22, and ch. iii. 22), and among them in all probability the Evangelist himself:—but not the rest of the Twelve, who were not yet called. Of this visit, the synoptic narrative records nothing. 14.] On the distinctness of this cleansing from that related in Matt. xxi. 12 ff., see note there.

ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ] In the court of the Gentiles, the ἔκθετος ἱερόν, as distinguished from the ναός, the inner temple. This market appears to have sprung up since the captivity, with a view to the convenience of those Jews who came from a distance, to provide them with the beasts for offering, and to change their foreign money into the sacred shekel, which alone was allowed to be paid in for the temple capitation-tax (Matt. xvii. 24 ff.). This tax was sometimes, as in Matt. l. c., paid elsewhere than in Jerusalem; but generally there, and in the temple. The very fact of the market being held there would produce an unseemly mixture of sacred and profane transactions, even setting aside the abuses which would be certain to be mingled with the traffic. It is to the former of these evils that our Lord makes reference in this first cleansing; in the second, to the latter.

15.] The σχοινία were probably the rushes which were littered down for the cattle to lie on. That our Lord used the scourge on the beasts only, not on the sellers of them, is almost necessarily contained in the form of the sentence here: the τὰ τε πρόβατα κ. τ. βόας being as it stands with τε and καί, merely epexegetical of πάντας, not conveying new particulars. So that it should be rendered as in A. V. R., “He drove all out of the temple, both the sheep and the oxen.” (ἐξέχεεν is the aor., not the resolved form of the imperfect: cf. Aristoph. Nub. 75, and see Lobbeck’s note on Phryn., p. 222.) It has been imagined, that He dealt more mildly with those who sold the doves, which were for the offerings of the poor. But this was not so: He dealt alike with all. No other way was open with regard to them, than to order them to take their birds away.

This cleansing of the temple was in the direct course of His manifestation as the Messiah. Immediately after the prophetic announcement of the Forerunner, Mal. iii. 1, is that of the Lord’s coming suddenly to His temple and purifying it. This act also answers (but like the fulfilment last mentioned, only in an imperfect and still prophetic sense) to the declaration of the Baptist “Whose fan is in His hand,” &c., Matt. iii. 12. His proceeding was not altogether unexampled nor unauthorized, even in an uncommissioned person: for all had the right to reform an abuse of this sort, and the zealots put this right in practice. The disciples by their allusion in ver. 17 seem to refer the action to this latter class.

the meaning of the Lord's saying;—which I do not think we are at liberty to question, on any, even the most moderate view, of the inspiration of the Scriptures. The difficulties attending the interpretation are,—besides the double meaning which I have treated above,—(1) the use of the imperative; as applied to the death of Christ. Olshausen contends that it must be mandatory, and cannot be hypothetical. But surely Matt. xii. 33 is an instance in point, as adduced by De Wette, for the hypothetical meaning: and usages exactly like that in our text are found in the reff. (w): see Winer, Gram. edn. 6, § 43. 2. (2) The words ἐγερῶ αὐτόν,—seeing that the resurrection of the Lord is ever spoken of as the work of the Father. Yes,—but by power committed to Christ Himself;—see ch. x. 18, where this is distinctly asserted: and ch. vi. 39, 40, 44, where it is implied, for He is the first-fruits of them that sleep,—and (though the whole course of His working was after the will of the Father,—and in the Spirit, which wrought in Him) strictly and truly raised Himself from the dead in the sense here intended. (3) The utterance of such a prophecy at so early a period of His official life. But it was not a prophecy known and understood,—but a dark saying, from which no one could then draw an inference as to His death or resurrection. The disciples did not understand it; and I cannot agree with Stier that the Jews could have had any idea of such being His meaning. Chrys. (Hom. xliii. in Joan. p. 134) says, πολλά τοιαῦτα φθίγγεται τοῖς μὲν τότε οὐκ ὄντα δὴλα, τοῖς δὲ μετὰ ταῦτα ἰσόμενα. τίνος δὲ εἵνεκεν τοῦτο ποιεῖ; ἵνα δευχθῇ πρὸς αὐτὸν ἄνθρωποι τὰ μετὰ ταῦτα, ὅταν ἰέλθῃ καὶ τῆς προφῆτειας τούτου γέγονεν. Lücke remarks, that the circumstance of the words being spoken so long before his trial by the Sanhedrim, would make it more easy for the false witnesses to distort them. This they did, but not so as to agree with one another. They reported it, 'I can destroy,' &c. which makes a wide difference, and represents our Lord as an enemy of the temple (Matt. xxvi. 61), and some added to τὸν ν. τ.,—τ. χειροποιήτον, and that He would raise another χειροποιήτον (Mark xiv. 58). ^{20.]} The building of the temple by Herod the Great is stated by Josephus, in Antt. xv. 11. 1, to have been begun in the eighteenth year of his reign; in B. J. i. 21. 1, in the fiftieth: the difference being made by counting his reign from the death of Antigonus, or from his appointment by the Romans, see Antt. xvii. 8. 1. Reckoning from this latter, we shall have twenty years till the birth of Christ, and thirty years since that event, from which fifty, however, four must be taken, since our era is four years too late. This gives forty-six. The temple was not completed till A.D. 64, under Herod Agrippa II., and the procurator Albinus; so that ψικοδομήθη, was in building, must refer to the greater part of the work now completed. The sense of this aor. is curiously illustrated by a passage in Ezra v. 16, τότε Σαββασάδρ ἐκεῖνος ἦλθε καὶ ἔδωκε θεμελίους τοῦ οἴκου τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ, καὶ ἀπὸ τότε ἕως τοῦ νῦν ψικοδομήθη καὶ οὐκ ἐτελείσθη.

22.] τῇ γραφῇ, by all analogy, must mean the O. T. scriptures. That the resurrection of the Lord is the subject of O. T. prophecy, we find in several passages of the N. T. see ch. xx. 9; Luke xxiv. 26, 27; 1 Cor. xv. 4. At first sight it appears difficult to fix on any passage in which it is directly announced: but with the deeper understanding of the Scriptures which the Holy Spirit gave the Apostles and still gives the Christian Church, such prophecies as that in Ps. xvi. are recognized as

What miracles these were, is not related:—certainly some notable ones, see ch. iii. 2. The mention of them precludes us from understanding ch. iv. 54, as indicating that the healing of the ruler's son was absolutely His second miracle.

24, 25.] The repetition of ἐγινωσκ. has been regarded (Lücke, De Wette) as a sort of play on the word. But I should rather set it down to the simplicity of John's style. The meaning is, He did not trust Himself to them,—i. e. treat them as true and earnest disciples: they entered into no spiritual relation with Him, and He in consequence into none with them. The fact of this being narrated shews that it made an impression on the Evangelist, and led him perhaps first to the conclusion which he here expresses, and which higher knowledge enabled him afterwards to place, as he here does, on its right ground;—His knowing what was in men. Nothing less than divine knowledge is here set forth; the words are even stronger than if τῶν ἀνθ. and ἐν τοῖς ἀνθ. had been used. Then some reference might have been imagined to the here mentioned; but now, the sing and must be on all hands, purely s—as in E. V.

know the real character of this Person who wrought such miracles. It is harsh, in this private conversation, to take the plural as merely of singular import, as Lightfoot seems to do. His other rendering, 'vulgo agnoscitur,' is better,—but not satisfactory; for the common people did not generally confess it, and Nicodemus, as an ἀρχων, would not be likely to speak in their name (see ch. vii. 49). I would rather take it to express the true conviction respecting Jesus, of that class to which Nicodemus belonged—the ἀρχοντες: and see in it an important fact, that their persecutions and murder of the Prince of Life hence found their greatest aggravation, that they were carried on against the conclusions of their own minds, out of bitter malice, and worldly disappointment at His humble and unobtrusive character, and the spiritual purity and self-sacrifice which He inculcated. Still this must not, though undoubtedly it has truth in it, be carried too far: cf. Acts iii. 17 note, and Acts xiii. 27; 1 Cor. ii. 8. Some degree of ignorance there must necessarily have been in all of them, even Caiaphas included, of our Lord's Office and Person. Stier (iv. 11 ff., edn. 2) seems to think that Nicodemus, by using the plural, is sheltering himself from expressing his own conviction, so as to be able to draw back again if necessary. [Ἀληθῶς] Stier (and Schleiermacher, cited by Stier, iv. 12, edn. 2, note) thinks that there is involved in this word a recognition by Nicodemus of the Messianic mission of Jesus:—that it expresses His being ὁ ἐρχόμενος (Matt. xi. 3 al.). It is never used of any but the Messiah, except by the Lord Himself, when speaking of John the Baptist as the subject of prophecy (see Matt. xi. 14 al.). [διδάσκαλος] In this and the following words, Nicodemus seems to be cautiously withdrawing from his admission being taken as expressing too much. For who of the Jews ever expected a teacher to come from God? They looked for a King, to sit on David's throne,—a Prophet, to declare the divine will;—but the Messiah was never designated as a mere teacher, till the days of modern Socinianism. So that he seems trying to qualify or recall his Ἀληθῶς by this addition.

The following words exhibit the same cautious inconsistency. No one can do, &c. unless—we expect some strong expression of the truth, such as we had from Nathanael in ch. i. 50, but the sentence drops to merely—'God be with him,' which is a very poor and insufficient exponent of ἀπὸ θ. ἀληθῶς. Against this inconsistency,—the inner knowledge that the Kingdom of God was come, and He who was to found it, on the one hand,—and the rationalizing endeavour to reduce this heavenly kingdom to mere learning, and its Founder to a mere teacher, on the other,—is the following discourse directed.

3.] We are not to imagine that any thing is wanting to complete the sense or connexion. Our Lord replies, It is not learning, but life, that is wanted for the Messiah's Kingdom; and life must begin by birth. Luther (Stier, iv. 17, edn. 2) says: "My teaching is not of doing and leaving undone, but of a change in the man (nicht von Thun und Lassen, sondern von Werden);—so that it is, not new works done, but a new man to do them; not another life only, but another birth." And only by this means can Nicodemus gain the teaching for which he is come,—ἵνα ῥ. β. τ. θ.,—'become a disciple of Christ:'—Ἰδοὺ, τούτοις νοήσαι, Thl.,—'understand, by sharing'—have any conception of.' ἀνωθεν—οὐ μὲν "ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ" φασιν, οἱ δὲ "ἐξ ἀρχῆς." Chr.,—who, as also Euthym., explains γεν. ἅν. by παλιγγενεσία:—Orig. Cyr. and Thl. taking the other meaning. The true meaning is to be found by taking into account the answer of Nicodemus, who obviously understood it of a new birth in mature life. Born afresh would be a better rendering than 'born again,' being closer to the meaning of ἀνωθεν, 'from the very beginning';—'unless a man begin his life anew altogether (πάλιν ἀνωθεν, Gal. iv. 9), he cannot' &c. It is not impossible that the other meaning may lie beneath this,—as the βασιλεία is τοῦ θεοῦ, and so must the birth be;—but Grotius has remarked that in Hebrew and Aramaic (in one of which languages our Lord, discoursing with a Rabbinical Jew, certainly spoke) there is no word of double meaning corresponding to ἀνωθεν:—so that He must have expressed it, as Nicodemus understood it, of an entirely new birth. That John never uses the word elsewhere in this sense (Lücke) is here of little weight, for he uses it only three times more, and never with a verb cognate to γινώσκειν. The Evangelist most likely chose the Greek expression γεν. ἄν. as strictly corresponding to the term ἀναγεννάσθαι, which, when he wrote, was in common use in the Church: see 1 Pet. i. 3, 23. Justin Martyr, as Dr. Wordsworth reminds us, quotes as our Lord's saying, Apol. i. 61, p. 79, ἀν μὴ ἀναγεννήθῃτε, οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθῃτε εἰς τ. βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν: probably mixing this with Matt. xviii. 3. On the birth itself, see below, ver. 5.

4.] It is impossible that Nicodemus can have so entirely and stupidly misunderstood our Lord's words, as his question here would seem to imply. The idea of new birth was by no means alien from the Rabbinical views. They described a proselyte when baptized as 'sicut parvulus jam natus.' Lightfoot in loc. I agree with Stier in thinking that there was something of the spirit that would not understand, and the disposition to turn to ridicule what he heard. But together with this there was also considerable real ignorance. The proselyte might be regarded as born again, when he became one of the seed of Abraham: this figure would be easily explained on the Judaical view: but that every man should need this, was beyond Nicodemus's comprehension. He therefore rebuts the assertion with a reductio ad absurdum, which in spirit expresses, as in ch. vi. 60,—'This is an hard saying; who can hear it?' γέρον ἄν: probably he himself was old, and he instances his own case. Our Lord passes by the question of demus without notice, further than this His second assertion takes as the ground from under it, by explaining the token and means of the new

There can be no doubt, on honest interpretation of the words γεννηθῆναι ἐξ ὕδατος refers to the outward sign of baptism,—γ. &c. ματος to the thing signified, or grace of the Holy Spirit. All attempts to get rid of these two plain facts sprung from doctrinal prejudices, by the views of expositors have been vain. Such we have in Calvin: 'spiritus nos repurgat, et qui virtute sua diffusa vigorem inspirat celestis vi Grotius: 'spiritum aquas instar emittentem';—Cocceius: 'gratiam Dei, sociis vitia abludentem';—Lampe: 'obedientia Christi';—Tholuck, who holds the Baptism itself, but only its idea, cleansing, is referred to;—and who endeavour to resolve ὕδατος πνεύματος into a figure of ἐν διδ so as to make it mean 'the cleansing purifying Spirit.' All the better deeper expositors have recognized the existence of the two, water and the spirit. So for the most part the ancient Lücke (in his last edition), De Neander, Stier, Olshausen, &c. being then recognized, to what does refer? At that time, two kinds of baptism were known: that of the proselyte by which they were received into Judaism;—and that of John, by which, as a preparatory rite, symbolizing repentance, people were made ready for Him who came to baptize them with the Holy Spirit. But both these were significant of the same truth; that namely, entire cleansing of the man for the new and spiritual life on which he entered, symbolized by water cleansing the outward person. Both were appropriate means,—the one by the Jewish Church the other, stamping that first with approval, by God Himself,—towards respective ends. John himself de his baptism to be incomplete,—it was only with water; One was coming, who should baptize with the Holy Ghost. That declaration of his is the key to the understanding of this verse. Baptism, complete, with water and the Spirit, is the admission into the kingdom of God. Those who have received the outward sign and the spiritual grace, have entered into that Kingdom. And this entrance was fully ministered to the disciples when the Spirit descended on them on the day of Pentecost. So that, as spoken to Nicodemus, these words referred him to the baptism of John, which probably (see Luke vii. 30) he had slighted. But they were not only spoken to him. The words of our Lord have in them life and meaning for all ages of His Church: and more especially these opening declarations of His ministry. He here unites together the two elements of a complete Baptism which were sundered in the words of the Baptist, ch. i. 33—in which united form He afterwards (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20; Mark xvi. 16) ordained it as a Sacrament of His Church. Here He speaks of spiritual Baptism, as in ch. vi. of spiritual Communion, and in both places in connexion with the outward conditions and media of these sacraments. It is observable that here, as ordinarily (with a special exception, Acts x. 44 ff.), the outward sign comes first, and then the spiritual grace, vouchsafed in and by means of it where duly received.

εἰσελθεῖν εἰς is more than εἰδέν above, though no stress is to be laid on the difference. The former word was perhaps used because of Nicodemus's expectation of teaching being all that was required: but now, the necessity of a real vital change having been set forth, the expression is changed to a practical one—the entering into the Kingdom of God.

6.] The neuter denotes not only the universal application of this truth, but (see Luke i. 35) the very first beginnings of life in the embryo, before sex can be predicated. So Bengel: 'notat ipsa prima stamina vitæ.' The Lord here answers Nicodemus's hypothetical question of ver. 4, by telling him that even could it be so, it would not accomplish the birth of which He speaks. In this σάρξ is included every part of that which is born after the ordinary method of generation: even the spirit of man, which, receptive as it is of the Spirit of God, is yet in the natural birth dead, sunk in trespasses and sins, and in a state of wrath. Such 'flesh and blood' cannot inherit the Kingdom of God, 1 Cor. xv. 50. But when the man is born again of the Spirit (the water does not appear any more, being merely the outward form of reception,—the less included in the greater), then just as flesh generates flesh, so spirit generates spirit, after its own image, see 2 Cor. iii. 18 fin.; and since the Kingdom of God is a spiritual kingdom, such only who are so born can enter into it.

7.] The weightiest word here is ἐμᾶς. The Lord did not, could not, say this of Himself. Why?—Because in the full sense in which the flesh is incapacitated from entering the kingdom of God, He was not born of the flesh. He inherited the weakness of the flesh, but His spirit was not, like that of sinful man, alien from holiness and God; and therefore on Him no second birth passed; when the Holy Spirit descended on Him at his baptism, the words spoken by the Father were indicative of past approval, not of renewal. His obedience was accepted as perfect, and the good pleasure of the Father rested on Him. Therefore He includes not Himself in this necessity for the new birth.

The μὴ θαυμάσῃς applies to the next verse, in which Nicodemus is told that he has things as wonderful around him every day in the natural world.

8.] Our Lord might have chosen any of the mysteries of nature to illustrate the point:—He takes that one, which is above others symbolic of the action of the Spirit, and (which in both languages, that in which He spoke, as well as that in which His speech is reported) is expressed by the same word as it. So that the words as they stand apply themselves at once to the Spirit and His working, without any figure;—spiritus ubi vult spirat. Bengel, after Origen and Augustine, takes τὸ πν. of the Holy Spirit exclusively: but this can hardly be. The form of the sentence, as well as its import, is against it. The πνεῖ, ἀκρότης, οὐδὲν, are all said of well-known facts. And the comparison would not hold on that supposition—'As the Spirit is in His working on those born of Him, so is every one that is born of the Spirit.' But on the other interpretation, we have The wind breatheth, &c.:—so is, i. e. 'so it is with' (see a similar construction Matt. xiii. 45) every one born of the Spirit.

Notice it is not ὁ ἀνέμος here, but τὸ πνεῦμα, the gentle breath of the wind;—and it is heard, not felt;—a case in which the οὐκ οἶδας &c. is more applicable than in that of a violent wind steadily blowing. It is one of those sudden breezes springing up on a calm day, which has no apparent direction, but we hear it rustling in the leaves around.

The εἰπου θέλει, in the application, implies the freedom (2 Cor. iii. 17) and unrestrained working of the Spirit (1 Cor. xii. 11).

πᾶς δ' γ. Our Lord can hardly, as Stier explains (iv. 48, edn. 2), mean Himself by these words; or, if He does, only inclusively, as being γ. ἐκ τ. πν.,—not principally. He describes the mystery of the spiritual life: we see its effects, in ourselves, and others who have it; but we cannot trace its beginnings, nor can we prescribe to the Holy Spirit His course: He works in us and leads us on, accompanying us with His witness,—His voice, spiritually discerned.

'Homo in quo spiritus spirat, e spiritu respirat.' Bengel.

This saying of the Lord—in contradiction to all so-called Methodism, which prescribes the time and manner of the working of the Spirit—assures us of the manifold and undefinable variety of both these. 'The physiognomies of those who are born again, are as various as those of natural men' (Dräseke, cited by Stier, iv. 50, edn. 2).

9.] The question of Nicodemus is evidently still one of unbelief, though no longer of frivolity: see ver. 12.

10.] I believe the E. V. is right in rendering ὁ διδ. a master; the article is inserted as required by τοῦ before Ἰη which is expressed as giving a title to Ἰσρ. as the people of God. Or possible that ὁ διδάσκαλος may mean meant as one of οἱ διδάσκαλοι? I either of these reasons for the present the article, to supposing it to have emphatic meaning. Nicodemus was: festly in no supereminent place as the ἀρχοντες: see ch. vii. 50—52. less can I with Bp. Middleton, Gr. p. 242, 3, believe any blame conveyed the title.

11.] Henceforward that course is an answer to the question 8. τ. γεν.) of Nicodemus: by shewing the appointed means of this new and of being upheld in the life to which is the entrance, viz. faith is the 8 God. δ' οἶδαμεν λ. . .] Why plurals? Various interpretations

I had rather take it as a proverbial saying; q. d. "I am one of who," &c. Our Lord thereby bring the unreasonableness of that unbelief would not receive His witness, but it an exception to the general proverb rule.

ceiving of testimony;’ because it is the making subjectively real the contents of that testimony. So the πιστεύειν εἰς αὐτόν is, the full reception of the Lord’s testimony; because the burden of that testimony is, grace and truth and salvation by Himself. This faith is neither reasoning, nor knowledge, but a reception of divine Truth declared by One who came from God; and so it is far above reasoning and knowledge:—πιστεύομεν above οἶδαμεν. But what are the ἐπίστα?

The matters relating to the new birth which have hitherto been spoken of;—called so because that side of them has been exhibited which is upon earth, and happens among men;—ἀ τοῖς ἐπὶ γῆς ἐν διατριβῇ ἀνθρώποις δυνατὰ ὑπάρχειν καὶ νοηθῆναι, Origen. That the parable about the wind is not intended, is evident from x. οὐ πιστεύετε, which in that case would be ‘do not understand.’ And the ἱερουργία are the things of which the discourse goes on to treat from this point: viz. the heavenly side of the new birth and salvation of man, in the eternal counsels of God regarding His only-begotten Son.

Stier supposes a reference in this verse to Wisd. ix. 16, καὶ μόλις εἰκάζομεν τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, καὶ τὰ ἐν χερσὶν ὑπάρσκουσιν μετὰ πόνου, τὰ δὲ ἐν οὐρανοῖς τίς ἐξήχυσεν;

13.] The whole verse seems to have intimate connexion with and reference to Prov. xxx. 4; and as spoken to a learned doctor of the law, would recall that verse, —especially as the further question is there asked, ‘Who hath gathered the wind in His fists?’ (ἤρξατο πνεῦμα ὅτι), and ‘What is His name, and what His Son’s name?’ See also Deut. xxx. 12, and the citation, Rom. x. 6—8. All attempts to explain away the plain sense of this verse are futile and ridiculous. The Son of Man, the Lord Jesus, the Word made Flesh, was in, came down from, heaven,—and was in heaven (heaven above Him, heaven dwelling on earth, ch. i. 52), while here, and ascended up into heaven when He left this earth;—and by all these proofs, speaking in the prophetic language of accomplished Redemption, does the Lord establish, that He alone can speak of τὰ ἱερουργία to men, or convey the blessing of the new birth to them. Be it remembered, that He is here speaking proleptically, of results of His course and sufferings on earth,—of the way of regeneration and salvation which God has appointed by Him. He regards therefore throughout the passage, the great facts of redemption as accomplished, and makes announcements which could not be literally acted upon till they had been so accomplished. See vv. 14 ff., whose sense will be altogether lost, unless this ἀναβέβηκεν be understood of His exaltation to be a Prince and a Saviour. ὁ ὢν ἐν τ. οὐρ.] See ch. i. 18 and note. Doubtless the meaning involves ‘whose place is in heaven;’ but it also asserts the being in heaven of the time then present: see ch. i. 52. Stier (iv. 68, edn. 2) speaks well of the majestic ὁ ὢν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, by which the Lord characterizes His whole life in the flesh between the καταβαίνειν and the ἀναβαίνειν. As uniting in Himself God, whose dwelling is Heaven, with man whose dwelling is on earth, He ever was in heaven. And nearly connected with this fact is the transition to His being the fountain of eternal life, in vv. 14 ff.: cf. 1 Cor. xv. 47—50, where the same connexion is strikingly set forth.

To explain such expressions as ἀναβαίνειν εἰς τ. οὐρ., &c., as mere Hebrew metaphors (Lücke, De Wette, &c.) is no more than saying that Hebrew metaphors were founded on deep insight into divine truth:—these words in fact express the truths on which Hebrew metaphors were constructed. Socinus is quite right, when he says that those who take ἀναβ. εἰς τ. οὐρ. metaphorically, must in all consistency take ὁ καταβάς εἰς τ. οὐρ. metaphorically also; ‘qualis descensus, talis etiam ascensus.’ 14.] From this point the discourse passes to the Person of Christ, and Redemption by His Death. The Lord brings before this doctor of the Law the mention of Moses, who in his day by divine command lifted up a symbol of forgiveness and redemption to Israel. καὶ] We must avoid all such ideas as that our Lord merely compares His death to the elevation of the brazen serpent, as if only a fortuitous likeness were laid hold of by Him. This would leave the brazen serpent itself meaningless, and is an explanation which can only satisfy those who do not discern the typical reference of all the ceremonial dispensation to the Redeemer.

It is an important
 duty of an expositor here, to defend the obvious and only honest explanation of this comparison against the tortuous and inadequate interpretations of modern critics.
 The comparison lies between the exalted serpent of brass, and the exalted Son of Man. The brazen serpent sets forth the Redeemer. This by recent Commentators (Lücke, De Wette, and others) is considered impossible: and the tertium com-parationis is held to be only 'the lifting up.' But this does not satisfy the construction of the comparison. 'The brazen serpent was lifted up: every one who looked on it, lived,' = 'The Son of Man must be lifted up: every one who believes on Him, shall live.' The same thing is predicated of the two;—both are lifted up; cognate consequences follow,—body-healing and soul-healing (as Erakine, On the Brazen Serpent). There must then be some reason why the only two members of the comparison yet unaccounted for stand where they do,—considering that the does the bite of the serpent operate? It hath made Him to be, and being that to ME. This involves, on the part of the believer, the anguish of the bite of the fiery serpent,—and the earnest looking on Him in Whom sin is crucified, with the inner eye of faith. [εἰς αὐτὸν] Just as in the type, God did not remove the fiery serpents,—or not all at once,—but healing was to be found in the midst of them by looking to the brazen serpent (πᾶς ὁ δι-δραμὴν ἰδὼν αὐτὸν ζῆσθαι, LXX),—so the temptations and conflicts of sin shall not leave the believer,—but in the midst of these, with the Eye of Faith fixed on the uplifted Son of Man, he has eternal life; perishes not of the bite, but ζῆσθαι.

See on this verse the remarkable passage, Wied. xvi. 5—13, where as much of the healing sign is opened as could be expected before the great Antitype Himself appeared.

16.] Many Commentators—since the time of Erasmus, who first suggested the notion,—have maintained that the discourse of our Lord breaks off here, and the rest, to ver. 21, consists of the remarks of the Evangelist. (So Tholuck, Olshausen, Lücke, De Wette; which last attributes vv. 13, 14 also to John.) But to those who view these discourses of our Lord as intimately connected wholes, this will be as inconceivable, as the idea of St. Matthew having combined into one the insulated sayings of his Master. This discourse would be altogether fragmentary, and would have left Nicodemus almost where he was before, had not this most weighty concluding part been also spoken to him. This it is, which expands and explains the assertions of vv. 14, 15, and applies them to the present life and conduct of mankind. The principal grounds alleged for supposing the discourse to break off here seem to be (a) that all allusion to Nicodemus is henceforth dropped.

But this is not conclusive, for it is obvious that the natural progress of such an interview on his part would be from questioning to listening: and that even had he joined in the dialogue, the Evangelist would not have been bound to relate all his remarks, but only those which, as vv. 2, 4 and 9, were important to bring out his mind and standing-point. (β) that henceforth past tenses are used; making it more probable that the passage was added after the great events alluded to had taken place. But does not our Lord speak here, as in so many other cases, proleptically, of the fulness of the accomplishment of those designs, which in the divine counsels were accomplished? Is not this way of speaking natural to a discourse which is treating of the development of the new birth, itself not yet brought in till the Spirit was given? See a parallel instance, with the Evangelist's explanation, ch. vii. 37—39. (γ) on account of this use of μονογενῆς, vv. 16, 18, which is peculiar to John. But, as Stier well enquires (iv. 84, edn. 2), whence did John get this word, but from the lips of his divine Master? Would he have ventured on such an expression, except by an authorization from Him? (δ) It is asserted that John often continues our Lord's discourses with additions of his own;—and ver. 31, and ch. i. 16, are alleged as instances. Of these, ch. i. 16 is beside the question:—for the whole prologue is spoken in the person of the Evangelist, and the Baptist's testimony in ver. 15 is merely confirmatory of ver. 14, and then the connexion goes on with ver. 16. On the untenableness of the view with regard to vv. 31 ff., see notes there.

It would besides give us a very mean idea of the honesty or reverence of one who sets forth so sublime a view of the Divinity and Authority of our Lord, to suppose him capable, in any place, of attributing to his Master words and sentiments of his own invention. And that the charge amounts to this, every simple reader can bear testimony. The obvious intention of the Evangelist here is, that the Lord shall have said these words. If our Lord did not say them, but the Evangelist, we cannot stop with the view that he has added his own remarks to our Lord's discourse, but must at once pronounce him guilty of an imposture and a forgery. (See Stier, iv. 81 ff., edn. 2.) I conclude therefore on all these grounds that the words following, to ver. 21, cannot be otherwise regarded than as uttered by our Lord in continuation of His discourse.

[ἡγάγησέν] The indefinite signifying the universal and eternal existence of that love which God Himself is (1 John iv. 8). τὸν κόσμον, the world, in the most general sense, as represented by, and included in, man,—Gen. iii. 17, 18, and i. 28;—not, the elect, which would utterly destroy the force of the passage; see on ver. 18. The Lord here reveals Love as the one ground of the divine counsel in redemption,—salvation of men, as its one purpose with regard to them.

These words, whether spoken in Hebrew or in Greek, seem to carry a reference to the offering of Isaac; and Nicodemus in that case would at once be reminded by them of the love there required, the substitution there made, and the prophecy there uttered to Abraham, to which ἵνα πᾶς ὁ πιστ. so nearly corresponds. ἔδωκεν—absolute, not merely τῷ κόσμῳ—gave up,—παρίδωκεν,—Rom. viii. 32; where as Stier remarks, we have again, in the οὐκ ἐπίστατο, an unmistakeable allusion to the οὐκ ἐπίσταω, said to Abraham, Gen. xxii. 16.

[ἵνα . . .] By the repetition of this final clause verbatim from ver. 15, we have the identity of the former clauses established: i. e. the uplifting of the Son of Man like the serpent in the wilderness is the manifestation of the divine Love in the gift of the Son of God:—ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου of ver. 14, = in the strictest sense, ὁ υἱὸς αὐτ. ὁ μονογ. of ver. 16.

17.] The κόσμος,—the Gentile world,—was according to Jewish ideas to be judged and condemned by the Messiah. This error our Lord here removes. The assertion ch. ix. 39, εἰς κρίμα ἰγὼ εἰς τ. πόλ. τοῦτ. ἤλθον, is no contradiction to this. The κρίμα there, as here, results from the separation of mankind into two classes,—those who will and those who will not come to the light; and that result itself is not the purpose why the Son of God came into the world, but is evolved in the accomplishment of the higher purpose, viz. Love, and the salvation of men. Observe, the latter clause does not correspond to the former—it is not ἵνα σώξῃ τὸν κόσμον,—but ἵνα σωθῇ ὁ κόσμος δι' αὐτοῦ:—the free will of the κόσμος is by this strikingly set forth, in connexion with vv. 19, 20. Not that the Lord is not the σωτὴρ τοῦ κόσμου (ch. iv. 42), but that the peculiar cast of this passage required the other side of the truth to be brought out. 18.] On πιστ. εἰς αὐτ. (which is John's usual phrase) the remarks above on ver. 15 apply with little distinction; εἰς giving more the direction of the belief towards, and its resting upon, in its abiding in, Jesus as the Saviour.

οὐ κρίνεται—see ch. v. 24, where the same assertion is made more fully; and note there. ἤδη κέκριται, implying,—by no positive act of judgment of mine,—but by the very nature of things themselves. God has provided a remedy for the deadly bite of sin; this remedy the man has not accepted, not taken: he must then perish in his sins: he is already judged and sentenced.

μὴ πιστεύοντες] The perfect implies more than 'that faith is a definite act in time' (Lücke, De Wette); it sets before us the deliberate choice of the man, q. d. 'he hath not chosen to believe' (Lange, in Stier, iv. 93, edn. 2): see 2 Thess. ii. 11, 12. εἰς τὸ ἔν. not without meaning: that name was 'Ἰησοῦς, αὐτὸς γὰρ ὥσπερ τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν αὐτῶν, Matt. i. 21.

The μονογενοῦς also here sets before us the hopelessness of such a man's state: he has no other Saviour. 19.] The particular nature of this decided judgment is now set forth,—that the Light (see ch. i. 7, and notes) is come into the world (ἐλήλυθεν, in reference perhaps to ἐλήλυθας, ver. 2), and men (= ὁ κόσμος, men in general; an awful revelation of the future reception of the Gospel) loved (the perversion of the affections and will is the deepest ruin of mankind) the darkness (see note on ch. i. 5; = the state of sin and unbelief) rather than (not = 'and not,' but as Bengel says, 'Amabilitas lucis eos percudit, sed obhæserunt in amore tenebrarum,' see ch. v. 35; xii. 43; 2 Tim. iii. 4) the light, because their deeds were evil (their habits, thoughts, practices,—all these are included,—were perverted). ἡγάγη-

20.] This verse analyses the psychological grounds of the preceding. The φῶς is not here 'the common light of day,' nor light in general: but as before, the Light; i. e. the Lord Jesus, and His salvation: see ver. 21 fin.

There is here a difference between φαῦλα πρᾶσσειν, and ποιῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν, which is too remarkable to be passed over,—especially as the same distinction is observed in ch. v. 29.—οἱ τὰ ἀγαθὰ ποιήσαντες εἰς ἀνάστασιν ζωῆς, οἱ δὲ τὰ φαῦλα πράξαντες εἰς ἀν. κρίσεως. Bengel, who noticed this, hardly I think gives the right reason for it: 'malitia est irrequieta, est quiddam operosius quam veritas;' nor does Stier fully reach it, 'that πράσ. signifies more a subordination, a being the servants of sin, ἐργάται ἀδικίας, Luke xiii. 27.' I think the distinction is rather perhaps this,—that πρᾶσσειν is more the habit of action; so that we might say 'he that practises evil;' but ποιῶν the true doing of good, good fruit, good that remains. He who πρᾶσσει, has nothing but his πρᾶγμα, which is an event, a thing of the past, a source to him only of condemnation, for he has nothing to shew for it, for it is also φαῦλον, worthless; whereas he that ποιῶν, has his ποίημα,—he has abiding fruit; his works do follow him. So that the expressions will not perhaps here admit of being interchanged. (See however Rom. vii. 15—20, where the two verbs are certainly interchanged more than once.) There may possibly be a hint at the coming by night of Nicodemus, but surely only by a distant implication. He might gather this from what was said, that it would have been better for him to make open confession of Jesus; but we can hardly say that our Lord reproves him for coming even as he did.

21.] Who is this ποιῶν τ. ἀλήθ. ? the end of ch. i. will best explain to us,—ἐν ᾧ λόγος οὐκ ἔστιν, see also Luke viii. 15, and Ps. xv. The πρᾶστων πονηρὰ is crooked and perverse; he has a light, which he does not follow; he knows the light, and avoids it; and so there is no truth, singleness, in him; he is a man at variance with himself. But the simple and single-minded is he who knowing and approving the light, comes to it; and comes that he may be carried onward in this spirit of truth and single-mindedness to higher degrees of communion with and likeness to God. 'The good man seeks the light, and to place his works in the light, not from a vain love of praise, but from a desire for communion wherein he finds strength and security,' De Wette. But this is not all: the manifesting his works, that they are wrought in God, is and can be only by the candle of the Lord being kindled within him, and he himself born again in the Kingdom of God; see Ps. cxxxix. 23, 24.

We hear nothing of the effect produced on Nicodemus by this interview. It certainly did not alienate him from Jesus, see ch. vii. 50; xix. 39, also ch. xii. 42. "It speaks for the simplicity and historic truthfulness of our Evangelist, that he adds nothing more, and even leaves untold the immediate result which the discourse had." (Baumgarten-Crusius, in Stier, iv. 102, edn. 2.)

22.] μετὰ ταῦτα : the sequence is not immediate; for this, John uses μετὰ τοῦτο, see ch. xi. 7, 11; xix. 28.

τ. Ἰουδ. γ.] The rural districts of Judea, in distinction from the metropolis. ἰβᾶπτ., viz. by means of His disciples;—see ch. iv. 2, and note. The place is not named: perhaps He did not remain in one fixed spot.

23.] The situation of these places is uncertain. Eusebius and Jerome place Salim eight Roman miles south of Scythopolis, and Ænon at the same distance, on the Jordan. If Scythopolis was the ancient Bethshan, both places were in Samaria : and to this agree Epiphanius and the Samaritan chronicle called Abul Phatich. In Judith iv. 4, we find mention of ὁ αὐλὼν Σαλήμ in Samaria (see note on Heb. vii. 1). An Ænon in the wilderness of Judah is mentioned Josh. xv. 61, and ib. ver. 32, πηγή and πῦ, Σελεύμ κ. Αἶν (F.), both in Judah, where it is certainly more probable, both from the text here and from a priori considerations, that John would have been baptizing, than in Samaria. The name πῦ, is an intensive form of πῦ, a fountain, which answers to the description here given. Both places were West of the Jordan : see ver. 26, and compare ch. i. 28. παρ. κ. ἰβ., i. e. the multitudes.

24.] There is much difficulty, which probably never will be cleared up, about the date of the imprisonment of John, and its reference to the course of our Lord's ministry. Between Matt. iv. 11, 12, there seems to be a wide hiatus, in which (see note there) the first chapters of this Gospel should be inserted. But the records from which the three synoptic Gospels have arisen were apparently unconscious of any such interval. Our Evangelist seems here to refer to such records, and to insert this remark, that it might not be imagined, as it would be from them, that our Lord's public ministry (in the wider sense, see below on ver. 26) began with the imprisonment of the Baptist.

25.] The circumstances under which this dispute arose seem to have been these :—John and our Lord were baptizing near to one another. (On the relation of their baptisms, see below on ver. 26.) They were both watched jealously (see ch. iv. 1) by the Pharisees. One of these (Ἰουδαῖος, i. e. Ἰουδ. τις) appears to have entered into dispute with the disciples of John about the relative importance of the two baptisms; they perhaps maintaining that their master's καθαρισμός preparatory to the Messiah was absolutely necessary for all, and he (the Ἰουδαῖος) pointing out to them the apparent inconsistency of this Messiah himself authorizing a baptism in his name, and alleging that if so, their master's baptism was rendered superfluous. We are driven to these conjectures, because the text gives us no further insight into the fact than what the circumstances and the answer of John render probable.

26.] Compare ch. i. 28. πάντες ἔρχ.]

Not, probably, any who had been baptized already by John; but multitudes of persons. The baptism now carried on by the disciples appears to have stood very much in the same position as that of John. It was preparatory to the public ministry of our Lord properly so called, which began in Galilee after the imprisonment of John. It was not accompanied with the gift of the Spirit, see ch. vii. 39. As John's commission was now on the wane, so our Lord's was expanding. The solemn cleansing of the temple was its opening; and now it is proceeding onwards, gathering multitudes around it (see ch. iv. 1).

27.] The subject of this answer is,—the divinely appointed humiliation and eclipsing of the Baptist himself before the greater majesty of Him who was come after him. Accordingly he begins in this verse by answering to the zeal of his disciples, 'that he cannot go beyond the bounds of his heaven-appointed mission.' 'Non possum mihi arrogare et capere quæ deus non dedit.' (Wetstein). Some apply the words to Jesus:—εἰ δὲ λαμπρότερον ἔδεικνεν, καὶ πάντες πρὸς αὐτὸν ἐρχονται, θαυμάζειν οὐ χρὴ. τοιαῦτα γὰρ ἔδεικται. Chrys. But the whole tone of the answer makes the other view more likely. Of course the remark, being general, may in the background have reference to the greater mission of Jesus; but not primarily. The parallelism of ἄνθρωπος here and himself as the subject of εἶπον in the next verse, also supports this view; see Heb. v. 4.

28.] 'Not only so, but I have always given the same consistent testimony; that I was only the forerunner of One greater than myself.' ἐκείνου does not refer to ὁ χριστός; in which case it would have been αὐτοῦ (see, however, apparent exceptions to this, ch. vii. 45; Acts iii. 13; see also Winer, Gr., edn. 6; § 23. 1): but to Jesus, as the subject of ver. 26; and thus is not merely a general testimony with regard to the Messiah, but a personal one to Jesus.

29.] Here first, (and here only in our Gospel,) comes from the mouth of the Forerunner, the great symbolical reference which is so common in the other Gospels and in the Epistles. It is remarkable that our Lord brings it forward in His answer to the disciples of John respecting fasting, Matt. ix. 15: where see note on the further import of the terms used.

The φίλος τοῦ νυμφίου (Heb. חַמֵּד) was the regular organ of communication in the preliminaries of marriage, and had the ordering of the marriage feast. It is to this last time, and not to any ceremonial custom connected with the marriage rites, that this verse refers. The friend rejoices at hearing the φωνὴ τοῦ νυμφίου, (see Jer. vii. 34; xvi. 9; xxv. 10: Rev. xviii. 23), in his triumph and joy, at the marriage. He χαρὰ χαίρει (see reff. 1 Thess. iii. 9, is not a parallel case as to construction, for ᾗ there is only by attraction) because he hears in the voice of the Bridegroom an assurance of the happy completion of his mission, and on account of the voice itself,—τὴν οὖτως γλυκίαν, τὴν οὖτως ἐπιδραστον, τὴν οὖτως σωτήριον. ἑστηκώς καὶ belongs merely to the graphic setting forth of the similitude. αὕτη . . . πεπλήρ.

31.] Many modern critics, beginning with Bengel and Wetstein, and including Lücke, Kuinoel, Olshausen, Tholuck, De Wette, and others, maintain that after ver. 30 we have the words, not of the Baptist, but of the Evangelist. Lücke and De Wette assume that the Evangelist has put his own thoughts into the Baptist's mouth, or at least mixed them with his words. The reason of this arbitrary proceeding is, (a) That the sentiments of the following verses seem to them not to be congruous with the time and position of the Baptist. But some of them confess (e. g. Lücke, De Wette) that this very position of the Baptist is to them yet unexplained, and are disposed to question the applicability to their idea of it of very much which is undoubtedly recorded to have been said by him. So that we cannot allow such a view much critical weight, unless it can be first clearly shewn, what were the Baptist's convictions concerning the Person and Office of our Lord. (β) That the diction and sentiments of the following verses are so entirely in the style of our Evangelist. But first, I by no means grant this, in the sense which is here meant. It will be seen by the ref. that the Evangelist does not so frequently repeat himself as in most other passages of equal length. And even were this so, the remark made above on vv. 16—21, would apply here also; that the Evangelist's peculiar style of theological expression was formed on some model; and on what more likely than in the first place the discourses of his divine Master, and then such sententious and striking testimonies as the present? But there is a weightier reason than these for opposing the above view, and that arises from what modern criticism has been so much given to overlook,—the inner coherence of the discourse itself; in which John explains to his disciples the reason why He must increase; whereas his own dignity be eclipsed before Him. This will below as we proceed. And nothing inconsistent with what He himself says of the Baptist in these He (the Baptist) ever speaks not a ciple of Jesus, not as within the Ki—but as knowing the blessedness who should be within it; as stand and hearing the Bridegroom's voice. Nor again is there any thing inco with the frame of mind which pr the question sent by John to ou afterwards in the onward waning days in prison; see note on Matt

δ ἀνωθ. ἐρχ.] This gives reason why He must increase: Hi and His words are not from below, temporary, limited; but are divine, exhaustible; and, ver. 32], His is not, like John's, only of what been forewarned to expect, but which He has seen and heard. But —i. e. in reference to the κόσμ which He is come, the σκορία in wh light shines,—no one comparative ceives His testimony. The state o minds at Jerusalem with regard t must ere this have been well know Baptist. 'Spiritus sanctus non habitavit super Prophetas, nisi mensura quadam; quidam enim librum unum, quidam duos vaticiniorum ediderunt.' (Vajikra rabba, in Wetstein.) This unmeasured pouring of the Spirit on Him accounts for his speaking the words of God. 35.] This, again, is the ground why the Father gives not the Spirit by measure (to Him): see Matt. xi. 27—29, with which this verse forms a remarkable point of connexion, shewing that what is commonly known as John's form of expression was not confined to him, but originated higher, having its traces in the synoptic narrative, which is confessedly, in its main features, independent of him. 36.] Compare ch. i. 12, 13; ver. 15. ἀπειθῶν may mean however to such a supposition here, or any where else in our Evangelist, is, that he would naturally have specified whether it was 6 A.M. or P.M. The unusualness of a woman coming to draw water at mid-day is no argument against its possibility; indeed the very fact of her being alone seems to shew that it was not the common time. This purely arbitrary hypothesis of St. John's way of reckoning the hours has been recently again upheld by Dr. Wordsworth: but it has only harmonistic grounds to rest on. The passage which he urges as supporting it, Martyr. Polycarp. c. 21, p. 1014, ed. Migne, does not in reality give it the least countenance. The ἡρα ὀδόν there mentioned is much more probably according to the usual Roman computation.

7.] ἐκ τ. Σ., i. e. a Samaritan—so γυνὴ Χαναν. ἀπὸ τῶν ὀνίων ἱκετιών, Matt. xv. 22.

8.] The disciples had probably taken with them the baggage, among which would be the ἀντλήμα,—see ver. 11. The Rabbis say that a Jew might not eat the bread or drink the wine of a Samaritan: but that appears from this verse to be exaggerated.

9. [Ἰουδαῖος ἐν] She knew this perhaps by his dress, more probably by his dialect. There seems to be a sort of playful triumph in the woman's question, q. d. 'even a Jew, when weary and athirst, can humble himself to ask drink of a Samaritan woman.'

ὁ γὰρ συγχρ. . . . are the words of the Evangelist to explain her question. συγχράσμαι is properly spoken of trade,—but here is in a wider signification. Wetstein quotes from Polybius, παρὰ Ταραντινὸν καὶ Λοκρῶν συγχρησάμενοι πεινηκοντόρους καὶ τρι-

VOL. I.

ἡρα. Notice Ἰουδ. and Σαμ. both anarthrous—"Jews have no dealings with Samaritans." The fact is abundantly illustrated in the Rabbinical writings: see Schöttg. h. l. The question of the woman shews a lively naïve disposition, which is further drawn out and exemplified by Him who knew what is in man, in the following dialogue.

10.] The important words the gift of God have been misunderstood by many Commentators. Some suppose them to mean 'our Lord himself,' and to be in apposition with the next clause, καὶ τις ἵστιν κ.τ.λ. Others, 'this opportunity of speaking with me.' Doubtless both these meanings are involved,—especially the former: but neither of them is the primary one, as addressed to the woman. The WATER is, in this first part of the discourse, the subject, and serves as a point of connexion, whereby the woman's thoughts may be elevated, and her desire aroused. The process of the discourse in this particular is similar to that in Acts xiv. 17. From recognizing this water as the gift of God, in its limitation, ver. 13, and its parabolic import, ver. 14, her view is directed to Him who was speaking with her, and the Gift which He should bestow,—THE GIFT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT: see ch. vii. 37—39.

τίς ἵστιν] These pregnant words form the second step in our Lord's declaration. He who speaks with thee is no ordinary Ἰουδαῖος, nor any ordinary man, but One who can give thee the gift of God; One sent from God, and God Himself. All this lies in the words, which however only serve to arouse in the woman's mind the question of ver. 12 (see below).

water with joy out of the wells of salvation" (Isa. xii. 3) at his pleasure. 'Ubi sitis recurrit, hominis, non aquae defectus est.' Bengel.

γενήσεται πηγή] All earthly supplies have access only into those lower parts of our being where the desires work themselves out—are but local applications; but the heavenly gift of spiritual life which Jesus gives to those who believe on Him, enters into the very secret and highest place of their personal life, the source whence the desires spring out;—and, its nature being living and spiritual, it does not merely supply, but it lives and waxes onward, unto everlasting life, in duration, and also as producing and sustaining it. It should not be overlooked, that this discourse had, besides its manifold and wonderful meaning for us all, an especial moral one as applied to the woman,—who, by successive draughts at the 'broken cistern' of carnal lust, had been vainly seeking solace:—and this consideration serves to bind on the following verses (ver. 16 ff.) to the preceding, by another link besides those noticed below.

¹⁵.] This request seems to be made still under a misunderstanding, but not so great an one as at first sight appears. She apprehends this water as something not requiring an ἀντλημα to draw it;—as something whose power shall never fail;—which shall quench thirst for ever;—and half in banter, half in earnest, wishing perhaps besides to see whether the gift would after all be conferred, and how,—she mingles in with the τοῦτο τὸ ὕδωρ,—implying some view of its distinct nature,—her 'not coming hither to draw,'—her willing avoidance of the toil of her noonday journey to the well. We must be able to enter into the complication of her character, and the impressions made on her by the strange things which she has heard, fully to appreciate the spirit of this answer.

¹⁶.] The connexion of this verse with the foregoing has been much disputed; and the strangest and most unworthy views have been taken of it. Some (e. g. Grotius) have strangely referred it to the supposed indecorum of the longer continuance of the colloquy with the woman alone; some more strangely still (Cyril Alex. in Catena, Lücke, p. 588) to the incapacity of the female mind to apprehend the matters of which He was to speak. Both these need surely no refutation. The band of women from Galilee, 'last at the cross, and earliest at the tomb,' are a sufficient answer to them.

Those approach nearer the truth, who believe the command to have been given to awaken her conscience (Maldonatus and al.); or to shew her the divine knowledge which the Lord had of her heart (Meyer). But I am persuaded that the right account is found, in viewing this command, as the first step of granting her request, δός μοι τοῦτο τὸ ὕδωρ. The first work of the Spirit of God, and of Him who here spoke in the fulness of that Spirit, is, to convince of sin. The 'give Me this water' was not so simple a matter as she supposed. The heart must first be laid bare before the Wisdom of God: the secret sins set in the light of His countenance; and this our Lord here does. The command itself is of course given in the fulness of knowledge of her sinful condition of life. In every conversation which our Lord held with men, while He connects usually one remark with another by the common links which bind human thought, we perceive that He knows, and sees through, those with whom He speaks. Euthymius, though not seeing the whole bearing of the command, expresses well this last remark:—ἀγχιμένης καὶ ζητούσης λαβεῖν, λέγει ὁ Ἰησοῦς κ.τ.λ. προσποιούμενος ὅτι χρὴ ἐκείνην κοινωῆσαι ταύτῃ τοῦ ὕδωρος. καὶ ὅτι μὲν οὐκ ἔχει ἄνδρα νόμιμον ἐγίνωσκεν, ὥς πάντα εἰδώς ἐβούλετο διὰ ταύτην εἰπεῖν ὅτι οὐκ ἔχω ἄνδρα, ἵνα λοιπόν, προφάσειως δραπεζάμενος, προφητεύσῃ τὰ κατ' αὐτὴν καὶ διορθώσῃ ταύτην. θέλει γὰρ τὼν προφ- ment to be treated as something unexpected by Him who commanded her (Lücke). He has before Him her whole life of sin, which she in vain endeavours to cover by the doubtful words of this verse.

18.] There was literal truth, but no more, in the woman's answer: and the Lord, by His divine knowledge, detects the hidden falsehood of it.
 Notice it is ἀληθές, not ἀληθὺς: this one word was true: further shewn by the emphatic position of ἄνδρα in our Lord's answer.

πέντε γὰρ ἄνδ.
 [σχες] These five were certainly lawful husbands; they are distinguished from the sixth, who was not;—probably the woman had been separated from some by divorce (the law of which was but loose among the Samaritans),—from some by death,— or perhaps by other reasons more or less discreditable to her character, which had now become degraded into that of an openly licentious woman. The conviction of sin here lies beneath the surface: it is not pressed, nor at the moment does it seem to have worked deeply, for she goes on with the conversation with apparent indifference to it; but our Lord's words in vv. 25, 26 would tend to infix it more deeply, and we find at ver. 29, that it had been working during her journey back to the city.

19.] In speaking this her conviction, she virtually confesses all the truth. That she should pass to another subject immediately, seems, as Stier remarks (iv. 125, edn. 2), to arise, &

 a wish to turn the conversation

 real desire to obtain from this the teaching requisite that she go and LXX is Ebal, but that of the Samaritan Pentateuch, Gerizim (probably an alteration): also by Gen. xii. 6, 7; xiii. 4; xxxiii. 18, 20; Deut. xi. 26 ff. Our fathers most likely mean not the patriarchs, but the ancestors of the then Samaritans.

ὁ τόπος] The definite place spoken of Deut. xii. 5. She pauses, having suggested, rather than asked, a question,—seeming to imply, ‘Before I can receive this gift of God, it must be decided, where I can acceptably pray for it;’ and she leaves it for Him whom she now recognizes as a prophet, to resolve this doubt.

^{21.}] Our Lord first raises her view to a higher point than her question implied, or than indeed she, or any one, without His prophetic announcement, could then have attained. οὔτε . . . οὔτε are exclusive; Ye shall worship the Father, but not (only) in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem:—had it been οὐδὲ . . . οὐδὲ, it would have meant, ‘Ye shall not worship the Father, either in this mountain, or even in Jerusalem.’ The προσκυνήσετε, though embracing in its wider sense all mankind, may be taken primarily as foretelling the success of the Gospel in Samaria, Acts viii. 1—26.

τῷ πατρί, as implying the One God and Father of all. There is also, as Calvin remarks (Stier, iv. 129, edn. 2), a ‘tacita oppositio’ between ὁ πατήρ, and ὁ π. ἡμ. Ἰακώβ, ver. 12, οἱ πατέρες ἡμῶν, ver. 20.

^{23.}] But He will not leave the temple of Zion and the worship appointed by God without His testimony. He decides her question not merely by affirming, but by proving the Jewish worship to be the right one. In the Samaritan worship there was no leading of God to guide them, there were no prophetic voices revealing more and more of His purposes. The neuter δ is used to shew the want of personality and distinctness in their idea of God:—the second δ, merely as corresponding to it in the other member of the sentence. Or perhaps better, both, as designating merely the abstract object of worship, not the personal God. The ἡμεῖς is remarkable, as being the only instance of our Lord thus speaking. But the nature of the case accounts for it. He never elsewhere is speaking to one so set in opposition to the Jews on a point where Himself and the Jews stood together for God’s truth. He now speaks as a Jew. The nearest approach to it is in His answer to the Canaanitish woman, Matt. xv. 24, 26.

ὅτι, because; this is the reason why we know what we worship, because the promises of God are made to us, and we possess them and believe them; see Rom. iij. 1, 2. ἡ σωτ. ἐκ τ. Ἰ. ἐστίν.] It was in this point especially, expectation of the promised salvation by the great Deliverer (see Gen. xlix. 18), that the Samaritan rejection of the prophetic word had made them so deficient in comparison of the Jews. But not only this;—the Messiah Himself was to spring from among the Jews, and had sprung from among them;—not ἐστίν, but ἐστίν, the abstract present, but perhaps with a reference to what was then happening. See Isa. ii. 1—3.

^{23.}] The discourse returns to the ground taken in ver. 21, but not so as to make ver. 22 parenthetical only: the spiritual worship now to be spoken of is the carrying out and consequence of the σωτηρία just mentioned, and could not have been brought in without it. καὶ νῦν ἐστίν] ‘Hoc (verru 21 non additum) nunc additur, ne mulier putet, sibi tantisper sedem in Judæa querendam esse.’ Bengel. οἱ ἀληθ. προσκ., as distinguished (1) from ἡγο- κρίτες, who have pretended to worship Him: (2) from all who went before, whose worship was necessarily imperfect.

δεῖ,—and denotes the earnestness of spirit with which the true worshippers shall worship; so Ps. cxliv. 18, ἰγγὺς κύριος πᾶσιν τοῖς ἱκεταλουμενοις αὐτὸν ἐν ἀληθείᾳ. A deeper meaning is brought out where the ground of this kind of worship is stated, in the next verse. ζητεῖ—not only 'requires,' from His very nature, but seeks,—is seeking. This seeking on the part of the Father naturally brings in the idea, in the woman's answer, of the Messiah, by Whom He seeks (Luke xix. 10) His true worshippers to gather them out of the world.

τοὺς προσκ.] The construction is, the Father is seeking for such to be the αὶ προσκυνούντες αὐτὸν,—'for of προσκ. abr. of this kind.' τοιούτους may be the predicate—"such the Father seeketh his worshippers to be:" or it may be the object—"such the Father seeketh as (or to be) his worshippers."

24.] πνεῦμα ὁ θεός, was the great Truth of Judaism, whereby the Jews were distinguished from the idolatrous people around them. And the Samaritans held even more strongly than the Jews the pure monotheistic view. Traces of this, remarks Lücke (from Gesenius), i. 599 note, are found in the alterations made by them in their Pentateuch, long before the time of this history. This may perhaps be partly the reason why our Lord, as Bengel remarks, 'Discipulis non tradidit sublimiora,' than to this Samaritan woman.

God being pure spirit (perhaps better not 'a Spirit,' since it is His Essence, not His Personality, which is here spoken of), cannot dwell in particular spots or temples (see Acts vii. 48; xvii. 24, 25); cannot require, nor be pleased with, earthly material offerings nor ceremonies, as such: on the other hand, is only to be approached in that part of our being, which is spirit,—and even there, inasmuch as He is pure and holy, with no by-ends nor hypocritical regards, but in truth and earnestness. But here comes in the deeper sense alluded to above. How is the Spirit of man to be brought into communion with God? 'In templo vis orare; in te ora. Sed esto templum Dei.' Aug. (Stier, i. edn. 2.) And how is this to be? cannot make himself the temple of So that here comes in the gift of with which the discourse began,—of the Holy Spirit, which Christ give to them that believe on Him we have 'praying in πνεύματι Jude 20. So beautifully does the sion ὁ πατήρ here bring with it the birth by the Spirit,—and for us, the of the Gospel, does the discourse of reflect light on this. And so would do these words form the conclusion great subject of these first chapters: IS BECOME ONE FLESH WITH US, WE MIGHT BECOME ONE SPIRIT HIM.'

25.] These words again uttered under a complicated feeling. her λαλιά, ver. 29, she certainly has suspicion (in her own mind, perhaps and beyond His own assertion of the but see note there) that He who has her all things, &c., was the Christ from her breaking in with this r after the weighty truth which had just spoken, it seems as if she thus, 'How these matters may be, I understand;—they will be all made when the Christ shall come.' tion of ver. 20 had not been answer her liking or expectation: she the puts aside, as it were, what has said, by a remark on that suspicion was arising in her mind.

It is certain what expectations the Samaritans had regarding the Messiah. The here advanced might be well deduced from Deut. xviii. 15;—and the name much that belonged to it, might have borrowed from the Jews originally.

λεγόμε. χριστός appear to me to be words of the woman, not of the Evangelist for in this latter case he would certainly have used ὁ μεσσίας again in ver. 29. also the difference of expression which inserts an interpretation, ch. i. 43 18, 17. It is possible that the name χριστός had become common in popular parlance, like many other Greek words and names.

ἀναγγελλει is used especially of enouncing or propounding by divine or superior authority,—see ref. ²⁶.]

Of the reasons which our Lord had, thus to declare Himself to this Samaritan woman and through her to the inhabitants of Sychem (ver. 42), as the Christ, thus early in his ministry, we surely are not qualified to judge. There is nothing so opposed to true Scripture criticism, as to form a preconceived plan and rationale of the course of our Lord in the flesh, and then to force recorded events into agreement with it. Such a plan will be formed in our own minds from continued study of the Scripture narrative:—but by the arbitrary and procrustean system which I am here condemning, the very facts which are the chief data of such a scheme, are themselves set aside. When De Wette says, ‘This early and decided declaration of Jesus is in contradiction with Matt. viii. 4, and xvi. 20,’—he forgets the very different circumstances under which both those injunctions were spoken:—while he is forced to confess that it is in agreement with the whole spirit of the Sermon on the Mount. He who knew what was in man, varied His revelations and injunctions, as the time and place, and individual dispositions required.

ἐγώ εἰμι.] The verb involves in it the predicate. ὁ λαλῶν σοι has a reference to her words, ἀναγγελεῖ ἡμ. πάντα

—I am He, who am now speaking to thee—fulfilling part of this telling all things; see also her confession ver. 29.

²⁷.] μετὰ γυν., with a woman.

No inference, it is true, can be drawn as to the indefiniteness of the noun, from the omission of the article after a preposition, see Bp. Middleton, ch. vi. § 1: but the position of μετὰ γυναῖκός before the verb throws an emphasis on the words, and makes it probable that the meaning is as above. τί [ζητεῖς; κ.τ.λ.] either—to the woman—What seekest thou? and to the Lord, Why talkest thou with her?—or perhaps both questions to Him: and then we must suppose a mixture of two constructions, of τί ζ. παρ’ αὐτῆς;—and τί λαλεῖς μετ’ αὐτῆς;—I rather prefer the former interpretation.

²⁸—³⁰.] She does not mention to the men His own announcement of Himself,—but as is most natural under such circumstances, rests the matter on the testimony likely to weigh most with them,—her own. We often, and that unconsciously, put before another not our strongest, but what is likely to be his strongest reason. At the same time she shews how the suspicion expressed in ver. 25 arose in her own mind. ³⁰.]

ἤρχοντο—were coming,—had not arrived, when what follows happened.

work in the soul of this Samaritan woman. Although ἐγώ and ὑμεῖς are emphatic, the words are not spoken in blame, for none was deserved: but in fullness and earnestness of spirit;—in a feeling analogous to that which comes upon us when called from high and holy employment to the supply of the body or business of this world.

βρώσις, generally distinguished, as 'eating,' from βρῶμα, 'food' (see ref. 1 Cor.).—is here equivalent to it.

33.] It is very characteristic of the first part of this Gospel to bring forward instances of unreceptivity of spiritual meaning; compare ver. 11; ch. ii. 20; iii. 4; vi. 42, 52. The disciples probably have the woman in their thoughts.

34.] Christ alone could properly say these words. In the believer on Him, they are partially true,—true as far as he has received the Spirit, and entered into the spiritual life;—but in Him they were absolutely and fully true. His whole life was the doing of the Father's will. We can 'eat and drink, &c. to the glory of God,'—but in Him the hallowing of the Father's name, doing His will, bringing about His Kingdom, was His daily bread, and superseded the thoughts and desires for the other, needful as it was for His humanity.

ἴνα is not = ὅτι. The latter would imply what was true (but not here expressed), that the absolute doing, &c. was His food;—as it now stands, it implies that it was His food to carry onward to completion that work; to be ever, step after step, having regard to its being completed. My meat is (not to do, as E. V., but) that I may do, &c. In the τελειώσω αὐτοῦ τὸ ἔργον, the way is prepared for the idea introduced in the next verse. These words give an answer to the questioning in the minds of the disciples, and shew that He had been employed in the Father's work during their absence.

35.] The sense of these much-controverted words will be best ascertained by nar observing the form of the sentence.

That we hear of no such proverb elsew is not to the point;—for such unrec sayings are among every people. Th do not know whence to date the months, is again no objection:—ther have been, in the part where the saying usual (possibly in the land west of the of Tiberias, for those addressed were thence, and the emphatic ὑμεῖς see point to some particular locality), fixed period in the year,—the end o sowing, or some religious anniversa when it was a common saying, th wanted four months to harvest. And might have been the first date in the which had regard to the harvest, at the best known in connexion with it.

If this be so, all that has been buil this saying, as giving a chronolo date, must fall to the ground. (L foot, Meyer (1), Wieseler, i. p. 215 ff., others, maintain, that since the ha began on the 16th of Nisan, we reckon four months back from that for this journey through Samaria, w would bring it to the middle of Chi i. e. the beginning of December.)

the verse, we must endeavour to follow, as far as may be, the train of thought which pervades the discourse. He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man: our Lord had now been employed in this His work. But not as in the natural year, so was it to be in the world's lifetime. One-third of the year may elapse, or more, before the sown seed springs up; but the sowing by the Son of Man comes late in time, and the harvest should immediately follow. The fields were whitening for it; these Samaritans (not that I believe He pointed to them approaching, as Chrys. and most expositors, but had them in his view in what he said), and the multitudes in Galilee, were all nearly ready. In the discourse as far as ver. 38, He is ὁ σπείρων, the disciples (see Acts viii.) were the οἱ ἔθριζοντες:—He was the εκοπισκός, they were the εις τὸν κόπον αὐτοῦ εἰσέληλυθότες. The past is used, as descriptive of the office which each held, not of the actual thing done. I cannot also but see an allusion to the words spoken by Joshua (xxiv. 13), on this very spot:—I have given you a land for which ye did not labour'—ἰφ' ἣν οὐκ ἐκοπίσατε ἐπ' αὐτῆς (αὐτῇ F.).

Taking this view, I do not believe there was any allusion to the actual state of the fields at that time. The words ἐπάρατε κ.τ.λ. are of course to be understood literally:—they were to lift up their eyes and look on the lands around them;—and then came the assurance;

'they are whitening already towards the harvest.' And it seems to me that on this view—of the Lord speaking of spiritual things to them, and announcing to them the approach of the spiritual harvest, and none else,—the right understanding of the following verses depends. It is of course possible that it may have been seed-time;—possible also, that the fields may have been actually whitening for the harvest;—but to lay down either of these as certain, and build chronological inferences on it, is quite unwarranted.

37 belongs certainly to ver. 35, and refers back to 31. Taken with ver. 36, it would not agree with the truth of the comparison. The harvest was not yet come. The ancient MSS. are not trustworthy guides in division and punctuation, which rather form matter of criticism, in which we stand on the same ground as they. 36.] The μισθός of the ἔθριζων is in the χαρὰ here implied, in having gathered many into eternal life, just as the βρώσις of the σπείρων was His joy already begun in His heavenly work. See Matt. xx. 1—16 and notes.

If we regard the bracketed article as omitted, the sense will of course be, Herein is that saying true. Such however is not St. John's usage: see above. 38.] Here, as often, our Lord speaks of the office and its work as accomplished, which is but beginning (see Isa. xli. 10). By ἄλλοι here He cannot mean the O. T. prophets (Grotius, Bengel, Lange), for then His own place would be altogether left out;—and besides, all Scripture analogy is against the idea of the O. T. being the seed of which the N. T. is the fruit;—nor can it be right, as Olshausen maintains, to leave Him out, as being the Lord of the Harvest:—for He is certainly elsewhere, and was by the very nature of the case here, the Sower. The plural is I believe merely inserted as the correspondent word to ὑμεῖς in the explanation, as it was ἄλλος—ἄλλος, in the proverb. (So Lücke, Tholuck, Stier, Wette denies their interpretation, but none of his own.) 39—42. truth of the saying of ver. 35 begins manifested. These Samaritans were foundation of the church afterwards up there. It does not seem that as racle was wrought there: αὐτοὶ δεῖνα was enough to raise their faith to a never attained by the Jews, and has yet by the disciples,—that He was Saviour of the world. Their view to have been less clouded by prejudicial narrow-mindedness than that of the and though the conversion of this lay not in the plan of the official life Lord, or working of His Apostles due (see Matt. x. 5),—yet we have abundant proof from this history, of His purposes towards them. We find no mention of the disciples again till ch. vi. 3.

^{44.} Much difficulty has been found in the connexion of this verse, but unnecessarily. Some have supposed that the Evangelist means Judaea by ἡ ἰδία πατρίς (Orig. Lücke [second edit., but see below], Ebrard, &c.),—which cannot be, for there is no allusion to Judaea at all here, as He came from Samaria, and the verse manifestly alludes to His journey into Galilee:—some, that Capernaum is meant, or Nazareth, and 'He went into Galilee,' as distinguished from one or other of these places (Chrys., Euthym., Cyril, Olsh.);—but neither can this be, for our Evangelist does not so lightly pass over the reasons of the remarks he makes, and there is no allusion to any city in Galilee, but to His going into Galilee in general.

Some again suppose it to be a reason why He did not go into Galilee before, but remained in Judaea and Samaria (Theophyl., Meyer (1), and somewhat similarly Neander, L. J. 385, and Jacobi); this however would be equally alien from the simplicity of John's style, and not in accordance with the fact of almost all His teaching and working being in Galilee. Nor is γὰρ to be rendered 'although' (Kuinoel)—a sense (Lücke, i. 613) which it never has. One admissible view is (Tholuck, Lücke [third ed.], De Wette), that this verse refers to the next following, and indeed to the whole narrative which it introduces. It stands as a preliminary explanation of the 'Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe;' and as indicating the contrast between the Samaritans, who believed on Him for His word,—and His own countrymen, who only received Him because they had seen the miracles which He did at Jerusalem. Such use of γὰρ is not unexampled (see Hartung, Partikellehre, i. p. 467; Lücke, 467; Thol.; De Wette; and Matthiae, Gr. Gr. § 616). In Herod. i. 124 we have ὡ καὶ Καμβύσιος, οἱ γὰρ θεοὶ ἱπορίωσι· οὐ γὰρ ἂν κορε ἴς τοσοῦτον τύχης ἀπίσειν σὺν νῦν Ἀστυάγει τὸν σιωποῦ φονία τίσαι. Soph. Antig. 393: ἀλλ', ἡ γὰρ ἐκτός καὶ παρ' ἡλπίδας χαρὰ | ἵσκειν ἀλλῃ μῆκος οὐδὲν ἡδονῇ, | ἦτε κ.τ.λ. And thus the οὖν in the next verse will be a particle connecting it with this preliminary reason given. But ἐμαρτύρησεν is not to be taken as a pluperfect.

A simpler view still is this: the reason (ver. 1) why He left Judaea for Galilee was, because of the publicity which was gathering round Himself and his ministry. He betakes himself to Galilee therefore, to avoid fame, testifying that His own country (Galilee) was that where, as a prophet, He was least likely to be honoured.

⁴⁵] They received Him, but in accordance with the proverbial saying just recorded;—not for any honour in which they themselves held Him, or value which they had for His teaching; but on account of His fame in Jerusalem, the metropolis,—which set them the fashion in their estimate of men and things.

καὶ αὐτοὶ γάρ, inserted for those readers who might not be aware of the practice of the Galileans to frequent the feasts at Jerusalem.

^{46.}] οὖν, perhaps (see above) because of the receptivity of Him from signs and wonders merely,—not as a Prophet from His teaching. But it is hardly safe in this gospel to mark the inference in οὖν so strongly: it is St. John's habitual particle of sequence, even where that sequence is not strictly logical, only temporal, and thus in God's purposes, no doubt, consequential.

βασιλικός] ἡ ἐκ γένους βασιλικού, ἡ ὡς ἀξιώματι κεκτημένος ἀφ' οὐπερ ἐκαλεῖτο βασιλικός (Euthym., Chrys.), ἡ ὡς ὑπηρέτης βασιλικός (Euthym.). Origen thinks he may have been one of the household of Cæsar, having some business in Judæa at that time. But the usage of Josephus is perhaps our surest guide. He uses βασιλ. to distinguish the soldiers, or courtiers, or officers of the kings (Herods or others), from those of Rome,—but never to designate the royal family: see B. J. vii. 5. 2; Antt. xv. 8. 4. So that this man was probably an officer of Herod Antipas. He may have been Chuza, Herod's steward, Luke viii. 3: but this is pure conjecture. The man seems to have been a Jew: see below. 47, 48.]

This miracle is a notable instance of our Lord 'not quenching the smoking flax': just as His reproof of the Samaritan woman was of His 'not breaking the bruised reed.' The little spark of faith in the breast of this nobleman is by Him lit up into a clear and enduring flame for the light and comfort of himself and his house. καταβῆ: see on ch. ii. 12. The charge brought against them, εὐν μὴ &c., does not imply, as some (Raphel and Storr) think, that they would not believe signs and wonders heard of, but required to see them laying the stress on ὤψεσθε)—for in this the expression would certainly have fuller, ἰδῆτε τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς, or some similar;—and it would not accord our Lord's known low estimate of all miracle-faith, to find Him making weighty a difference between faith miracles seen and faith from miracles heard. The words imply the contrast between Samaritans, who believed because of word, and the Jews (the plural reckon the βασιλικός among them), who will not believe but through signs and wonders:—see 1 Cor. i. 22. And observe that it is not implied that even when had seen signs and wonders, they will believe:—they required these as a condition of their faith, but even these rejected by them: see ch. xii. 37. But even with such inadequate conception and conditions of faith, our Lord recognizes the nobleman, and works the sign rather than dismiss him. It was otherwise Matt. xvi. 1 ff. 49.] Here is same weakness of faith,—but our Lord's last words have made visible impression. It is like the Syrophenician woman's rejoinder,—'Yea, Lord; but . . .', the faith is of a far less noble kind than hers. He seems to believe it necessary that Jesus should be on the spot;—that there was any thing strange or blamable in this, for Martha and Mary did same, ch. xi. 21, 32:—and to think it would be too late when his child had

pired;—not imagining that He to whom he spoke could raise the dead. 50.] The bringing out and strengthening of the man's faith by these words was almost as great a spiritual miracle, as the material one which they indicated. We may observe the difference between our Lord's dealing here and in the case of the centurion (Matt. viii. 6 ff. and ||). There, when from humility the man requests Him to speak the word only, He offers to go to his house : here, when pressed to go down, He speaks the word only. Thus (as Trench observes, after Chrysostom) the weak faith of the nobleman is strengthened, while the humility of the centurion is honoured.

51.] He appears to have gone leisurely away—for the hour (1 P.M.) was early enough to reach Capernaum the same evening (twenty-five miles) : in confidence that an amendment was taking place, which he at present understood to be only a gradual one. 52, 53.] κομψῶς εἶχεν in this sense is found in Arrian. Dissert. Epictet. iii. 10, cited by most of the Commentators. ὅταν ὁ ἱατρός εἰσέρηται, μὴ φοβεῖσθαι τι εἶπῃ μὴδ' ἂν εἰπῇ, κομψῶς εἶχε, ὑπερχαίρειν μὴδ' ἂν εἰπῇ, κακῶς εἶχε, ἀθυμῶν ἀφῆκεν αὐτ. ὁ πυρ.] This was probably more than he expected to hear; and the coincidence of so sudden a recovery with the time at which Jesus had spoken the words to him (after ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ understand ἀφῆκεν αὐτὸν ὁ πυρετός), raises his faith at length into a full belief of the Power and Goodness and the Messiahship of Him, who had by a word commanded the disease, and it had obeyed. The ἐπίστευσεν, absolutely, implies that in the fullest sense he and all his became disciples of Jesus. It is very different from ἐπίστευσεν τῷ λόγῳ ὃν εἶπ. Ἰησ. in ver. 50—as believing on HIM must be always different from believing on anything else in the world, be it even His own word or His own ordinances. Here the advocates of the (imaginary; see above on ver. 6) Asiatic division of the hours by St. John, suppose him to have put that division into the mouth of Jews in Galilee. But that division would in reality not help the narrative here at all, as they maintain. The βασιλικός probably set out, as indeed the narrative implies, immediately on hearing our Lord's assurance, and spent the night on the way. Indeed, curiously enough, Dr. Wordsw. makes him do this, and yet

54.] The meaning of the Evangelist clearly is, that this was the second Galilæan miracle (see ch. iii. 2, and ver. 45). But (1) how is that expressed in the words? The σημεία which He did at Jerusalem in the feast being omitted, the πάλιν δεύτερον σ. naturally carries the thoughts back to a former one related; and the clause added (ἐλθὼν ε. γ. λ.) shews, not that a miracle prior to this, during this return visit, has been passed over,—but that as the scene of this second was in Galilee, so that former one, to which δύο refers, must be sought in Galilee also. And then (2) why should this so particularly be stated? Certainly, it seems to me, on account of the part which this miracle bore in the calling out and assuring of faith by the manifestation of His glory, as that first one had done before. By that (ch. ii. 11), His disciples had been convinced: by this, one (himself a type of the weak and unworthy in faith) outside the circle of His own. By both, half-belief was strengthened into faith in Him: but in each case it is of a different kind.

It is an interesting question, whether or not this miracle be the same as the healing of the centurion's servant (or son, Matt. ?) in Matt. viii. 5: Luke vii. 1. Irenæus appears to hold the two narratives to be the same history (appears only; for his words are, 'Filius centurionis absens verbo curavit dicens Vade, filius tuus vivit.' Hær. ii. 22. 3, p. 147: which remark may be simply explained by his having cited from memory, and thus either made this βασιλικός a centurion,—or, which is more probable, having understood the παῖς in Matt. viii. as a son, and made our Lord there speak very similar words to those really uttered by Him, but which are in reality found here): so Eusebius also in his canons. Chrysostom notices, but opposes the view:—and it has never in modern times gained many advocates, being only held by Semler, Seiffarth, and the interpreters of the Straussian school. Indeed, the internal evidence is all against it: not only (ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀξιώματος, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀπὸ πῶς), does the man in one case from the man in the other. The kernel of the history is, in our case the elevation of a weak and mere seeking faith into a deep conviction personal power and love of our in the other, the commendation of confession of our Lord's divine indicating great strength and gr faith, and inducing the greatest p humility. And the external point b out in the commendation, οὐδὲ Ἰσραήλ, is not only different fr stands in absolute contrast with, tpreciating charge here, ὅταν μὴ συμρίπτα ἴδῃς, οὐ μὴ πιστεύσῃς. Olshausen (whose commentary on J far less elaborate than on the othe pels, which may account for my rel less often to it) well remarks, th narrative may be regarded as a seq the foregoing one.

try. Origen (whose commentary on this chapter is lost) mentions this view (tom. xiii. 39, p. 250), but apparently does not approve it. (MS. A reads ην ιορη των αζυμων κ.τ.λ.) This is the view of Luther, Calovius, Scaliger, Grotius, Lightfoot, Lampe, Kuinoel. (2) Cyril Alex. and Chrysostom think it to be the Pentecost; similarly Euthym. and Theophyl. This opinion prevailed in the Greek Church; and has been defended by Erasmus, Calvin, Beza, &c., and more recently by Bengel in his Harmony. (3) Kepler first suggested the idea that it might be the feast of Purim, (Euth. ix. 21, 26,) almost immediately preceding the Passover (the 14th and 15th of Adar). This was adopted by Petavius, and has been the general view of the modern chronologists. So Lamy, apparat. chronol., Hug, Lücke (1st ed.), Olshausen, Meyer, Wieseler, Stier, Neander, Winer. (4) The feast of Tabernacles has been suggested by Cocceius, and is supported by one ms. (131, which adds η σκηνοπηγια.) (5) Kepler and Petavius thought it also possible that the feast of Dedication (see ch. x. 22) might be meant. So that almost every Jewish feast finds some supporters. I believe with Lücke (3rd ed.), De Wette, and Tholuck, that we cannot with any probability gather what feast it was. Seeing as I do no distinct datum given in ch. iv. 35, nor again in ch. vi. 1, and finding nothing in this chapter to determine the nature of this feast, I cannot attach any weight to most of the elaborate chronological arguments which have been raised on the subject. It can hardly have been a Passover, both on account of the omission of the article before ιορη (see ch. vi. 4), and because if so, we should have an interval of a whole year between this chapter and the next, which is not probable. Nor can it have been the Dedication, in the winter; for then the multitude of sick would have hardly been waiting in the porches of Bethesda. The feast of Purim would nearest agree with the subsequent events; and it seems as if our Lord did not go up to Jerusalem at the Passover next following (ch. vi. 4; vii. 1), so that no difficulty would be created by the proximity of the two feasts, unless, with De Wette, we believe that the interval was too little for what is related ch. vi. 1—3 to have happened. But it may be doubted, (1) whether it was a general practice to go up to Jerusalem at the Purim; (2) whether our Lord would be likely to observe it, even if it was. No reason need be given why John does not name the feast; it is quite in accordance with his practice of mentioning nothing that does not concern his subject-matter. Thus the Passover is mentioned ch. ii. 13, because of the buying and selling in the temple; again, ch. vi. 4, to account for the great multitude, and as eminently suiting (see notes) the subject of His discourse there; the feast of Tabernacles, ch. vii. 2, because of the practice alluded to by our Lord in ver. 37; that of the Dedication, ch. x. 22, to account for His being in Solomon's porch because it was winter; but in this chapter, where there is nothing alluding to the time or nature of the feast, it is not specified. Ἰησοῦς] and probably His disciples: for the same expression is used ch. ii. 13, whereas we find, ch. iii. 22, that His disciples were with Him; compare also ch. vii. 10 and ch. ix. 2. 2.] ἔστιν has been thought by Bengel and others to import that John wrote his Gospel before the destruction of Jerusalem. But this must not be pressed. He might have spoken in the present without meaning to be literally accurate at the moment when he was writing (see Prolegg. to John, § iv. 6). ἐπὶ τῇ προβ., probably near the sheep-gate,—mentioned by Nehemiah, see ref. The situation of this gate is unknown;—it is traditionally supposed to be the same with that now called St. Stephen's gate; but inaccurately, for no wall existed in that quarter till the time of Agrippa (Robinson, i. 472). Eusebius, Jerome, and the Itinerarium Hieros. speak of a προβατικὴ κολυμβήθρα, so also probatica piscina, Vulg. The reading λεγομένη would be more usual;

βηθσδα = Syr. ܒܝܬ ܚܝܢ, the house (place) of mercy, or of grace. Its present situation is very uncertain. Robinson established by personal inspection the fact of the subterranean connexion of the pool of Siloam (see ch. ix. 7 note) and that called the Fountain of the Virgin (i. 501 ff.); and has made it probable that the Fountain under the grand Moske is also connected with them (i. 509 ff.); in fact that all these are but one and the same spring. (See also some interesting particulars respecting an attempt made subsequently to prove this connexion, and mention of a fourth fountain with the same peculiar taste as the water of Siloam, in Williams's Holy City, pp. 381 ff.) Now this spring, as he himself witnessed, (i. 506.) is an intermittent one, as indeed had been reported before by Jerome (on Isa. viii. 6), Prudentius (in Trench, Mir. p. 247, edn. 2), William of Tyre, and others. There might have been then, it is obvious, some artificially constructed basin in connexion with this spring, the site and memory of which have perished, which would present the phenomenon here described: see below. The spot now traditionally nothing else. In the background, and explanatory of both, was the popular belief of the Jews, not alleged by the evangelist. In very early times, this deficiency was supplied by the insertion of the spurious passage. I say, in very early times: for Tertullian refers to it in a way which leaves no doubt that he read it entire. 'Piscinam Bethesda[m] [cf. digest on ver. 2] angelus interveniens commovebat: observabant qui valetudinem querebantur. Nam si quis praevenerat descendere illuc, queri post lavacrum desinebat.' De Bapt. c. 5, p. 1205. So that the fact of so many different kinds of sick persons being mentioned here (Stier), and that of the connexion of the account almost requiring this passage as its explanation (De Wette), points to the reason why it was put in, to clear up a narrative otherwise obscure. I would not lay much stress on the variations in the passage, which are only such as are perpetually meeting us in the undoubted text: but the fact that there are no less than seven words used either here only, or here only in this sense, is strong against its genuineness: as is the concurrence of B, C, D, and N in omitting it. Of N. T. critics, Griesb. brackets it, Tischdf., Meyer, and Treg. omit it,—while Lachm. retains it in his text. De Wette, Lücke, and Luthardt, are undecided, but inclined more or less strongly against it. As a marginal gloss, it certainly does good service, as explaining both the obscure points—the assemblage of sick, and the answer in ver. 7.

κατέβαινον, was in the habit of descending: the imperfects continue throughout.] 8.] There are two ways of taking the construction of ἔχων: (1) to regard ἔχων ἐν τῇ ἀσθενείᾳ as the accus. of duration; which is objectionable on account of the article τῇ, (not on account of the present participle, as De Wette, for it is often found with duration of time,) and as being alien from John's usage, which is (2) to place ἔχω in this sense with an accusative of the time; see reff., and ver. 6. So that the construction is ἔχων τριάκ. ὅκτ. ἐτη ἐν τῇ ἀσθενείᾳ. Observe, he had been lame thirty-eight years, not at Bethesda all that time. 6.] γνούς, i. e. ἐν ταύτῃ, as on other similar occasions. Our Lord singled him out, being conscious of the circumstances under which he lay there, by that superhuman knowledge of which we had so striking an example in the case of the woman of Samaria.

Θάλας ὑγ. γ.; Lightfoot and Semler would supply, 'licet sit sabbatum.' But this is very improbable, see ver. 17. Our Lord did not thus appeal to his hearers' prejudices, and make His grace dependent on them. Besides, the ὑγιῆς γενέσθαι had in the mind of the man no reference to a healing such as there would be any objection to on the Sabbath; but to the cure by means of the water, which he was there to seek.

The question is one of those by which He so frequently testified his compassion, and established (so to speak) a point of connexion between the spirit of the person addressed, and his own gracious purposes. Possibly it may have conveyed to the mind of the poor cripple the idea that at length a compassionate person had come, who might put him in at the next troubling of the water. It certainly is possible that the man's long and apparently hopeless infirmity may have given him a look of lethargy and despondency, and the question may have arisen from this: but there is no ground for supposing (Schleiermacher) blame conveyed by it, still less that he was an impostor labouring under some trifling complaint (Paulus and others), and wishing to represent it more important than it was.

7.] The man's answer implies the popular belief which the spurious but useful insertion in vv. 3, 4 expresses. Bauer asks why the person who brought him there every day, could not have put him in? But no such person is implied. The same slow motion which he describes here, would suffice for his daily coming and going. 8.] The ἄρον τ. κρ. σου has been treated (Stier, iv. 168, edn. 2. Trench, Mir. 251, edn. 2) as making a difference between the man lame from his birth in Acts iii. 8, who walked and leaped and praised God; and this man, who, since sin had been the cause of his disease (ver. 14), is ordered to carry his bed, 'a present memento of his past sin.' Possibly; but our Lord must have had in his view what was to follow, and have ordered it also to bring about this his first open controversy with the Jews. 10.] οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, never the multitude, but always those in authority of some kind, whom John ever puts forward as the representatives of the whole people in their rejection of the Lord. οὐκ ἔξεστιν] The bearing of burdens on the Sabbath was forbidden not only by the glosses of the Pharisees, but by the law itself. out the unfavourable side of what had taken place, as malicious persons always do.

13.] Difficulty has been found here from the supposed improbability that some should not have told him, seeing that Jesus was by this time well known in Jerusalem. But this is wholly unnecessary. His fame had not been so spread yet, but that He might during the crowd of strangers at the feast pass unnoticed.

ῥέξενευσεν, passed on unobserved: just spoke the healing words, and then went on among the crowd; so that no particular attention was attracted to Himself, either by the sick man or others. The context requires this interpretation: being violated by the ordinary one, that Jesus 'conveyed himself away, because a multitude was in the place:' for that would imply that attention had been attracted towards him which He wished to avoid; and in that case he could hardly fail to have been known to the man and to others. Observe, ῥέξενευσεν has for its understood object, the man subjectively:—escaped his notice, a crowd being in the place: not referring to any thing which Jesus had done himself.

14.] The knowledge of our Lord extended even to the sin committed thirty-eight years ago, from which this long sickness had resulted, for so it is implied here. The ῥεῖρόν τι, as Trench observes (Mir.

254, edn. 2), 'gives us an awful glimpse of the severity of God's judgments;—see Matt. xii. 45.

15.] The man appears to have done this partly in obedience to the authorities; partly perhaps to complete his apology for himself (Bengel). We can hardly imagine ingratitude in him to have been the cause; especially as ὁ ποιήσας αὐτὸν ῥύγι speaks so plainly of the benefit received; compare ver. 11 and note.

16.] ῥέδιωκον is not used in the sense of legal prosecution in the N. T.:—persecuted is the best word for it.

17.] The true keeping of the rest of the Sabbath was not that otiose and unprofitable cessation from even good deeds, which they would enforce: the Sabbath was made for man;—and, in its Jewish form, for man in a mere state of legal discipline (which truth could not yet be brought out to them, but is implied in this verse, because His people are even as He is—in the liberty wherewith He hath made them free); whereas He, the only-begotten of the Father, doing the works of God in the world, stands on higher ground, and hallowes, instead of breaking the Sabbath, by thus working on it. "He is no more a breaker of the Sabbath than God is, when He upholds with an energy that knows no pause the work of His creation from hour to hour, and from moment to moment; 'My Father worketh hitherto, and I work;’ My work is but the reflex of His work. Abstinence from outward work belongs not to the idea of a Sabbath, it is only more or less the necessary condition of it for beings so framed as ever to be in danger of losing the true collection and rest of the spirit in the multiplicity of earthly toil and business. Man indeed must cease from his work if a higher work is to find place in him. He scatters himself in his work, and therefore he must collect himself anew, and have seasons for so doing. But with Him who is one with the Father, it is otherwise. In Him the deepest rest is not excluded by the highest activity.” (Trench, Mir. p. 257, edn. 2.) 18.] The ground of the charge is now shifted; and by these last words (ver. 17), occasion is given for one of our Lord’s most weighty discourses.

The Jews understood His words to mean nothing short of peculiar personal Sonship, and thus equality of nature with God. And that this their understanding was the right one, the discourse testifies. All might in one sense, and the Jews did in a closer sense, call God their, or our, Father; but they at once said that the individual use of ‘MY FATHER’ by Jesus had a totally distinct, and in their view a blasphemous, meaning: this latter especially, because He thus made God a participator in his crime of breaking the sabbath. Thus we obtain from the adversaries of the faith a most important statement of one of its highest and holiest doctrines. 19.] The discourse is a wonderful setting forth of the I Office of the Son of God in His tions as the Word of the Father has reference to the charge of w the Sabbath, and the context ta Lord’s answer both to this, ve to the Jews’ accusation, ver. 18. verse, He states that He cannot but the works of God: cannot very relationship to the Father very nature and necessity of th the ἄφ’ ἑαυτοῦ being an impossil sition, and purposely set here t one:—the Son cannot work of because He is the Son: His ver presupposes the Father’s will an as His will and counsel,—and H knowledge of that will and coun this, because every creature may freedom, and will contrary to t THE SON, standing in essential u God, cannot, even when becoi commit sin,—break the Sabbath whole Being and Working is i God. & γὰρ ἂν . . .] This c verts the former proposition, an its truth when thus converted. is the very nature of the Son to ever the Father doeth.’ Also, to works ὁμοίως—after the same proceeding, so that there can b cord, but unity. 20.] For is ensured by the fact, that) th loves the Son, and shews to Him the Lord sets forth to us the unf the will and purposes of the F [Mark xiii. 32: Acts i. 7] and in His Mediatorial office) all things which He Himself does (all the purposes of His secret counsel;—for with the Father, doing is willing; it is only the Son who acts in time); and this manifestation will go on increasing in majesty, that the wonder which now is excited in you by these works may be brought out to its full measure (in the acceptation or rejection of the Son of God—wonder leading naturally to the τιμῇ of ver. 23).

21.] It is very important to observe the distinction here between the working of the Eternal Son (in creation, e. g.) as He is ἐν οὐρανῷ, with God, and His working in the state of His humiliation in which the Father should by degrees advance Him to exaltation and put His enemies under His feet. Of the latter of these mention is made (ver. 20) in the future, of the former in the present. The former belong to the Son as His proper and essential work: the latter are opened out before Him in the process of His passing onward in the humanity which He has taken. And the unfolding of these latter shall all be in the direction of, and in accordance with, the eternal attributes of the Son: see ch. xvii. 5; resulting in His being exalted to the right hand of the Father. So here,—as it is the Father's essential work to vivify the dead (see Rom. viii. 11; 1 Sam. ii. 6 al.), so the Son vivifies whom He will: this last οὗς θέλει not implying any selection out of mankind, nor said merely to remove the Jewish prejudice that their own nation alone should rise from the dead,—but meaning, that in every instance where His will is to vivify, the result invariably follows.

Observe, this ζωοποιεῖ lays hold of life in its innermost and deepest sense, and thus finds its illustration in the waking both of the outwardly and the spiritually dead.

23.] In the οὗς θέλει γάρ is implied that as the Father does not Himself, by His own proper act, vivify any, but commits all quickening power to the Son:—so is it with judgment also. And judgment contains eminently in itself the οὗς θέλει,—when ζωον. is understood—as it must be now—of bestowing everlasting life. Again, the raising of the outwardly dead is to be understood as a sign that He who works it is appointed Judge of quick and dead, for it is a part of the office of that Judge:—in the vivifying, the judgment is made; see below, ver. 29, and Ps. lxxii. 1—4.

23.] This being so, the end of all is, the honour of the Father in and by the Son. He (the Son) is the Lord of life, and the Judge of the world;—all must honour Him with equal honour to that which they pay to the Father:—and whosoever does not, however he may imagine that he honours or approaches God, does not honour him at all;—because He can only be known or honoured by us as 'THE FATHER WHO SENT HIS SON.'

24.] What follows, to ver. 30 incl., is an expansion of the two assertions in vv. 21, 22,—the ζωοποιεῖν and the κρίνειν,—intimately bound up as they are together. There is a parallelism in vv. 24 and 25 which should be noticed for the right understanding of the words. ὁ τὸν λόγον μου ἀκούων in one, answers to οἱ νεκροὶ ἀκούσονται τῆς φωνῆς τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ in the other. It is a kind of hearing which awakens to life,—one accompanied by πιστεῖν τῷ πέμψαντί με. And this last is not barely 'Him who sent Me,' but Him, the very essence of belief in Whom is in this, THAT HE SENT ME (see ch. xii. 44). And the δαῖσε here after πιστεῖν expresses that belief in the testimony of God that He hath sent His Son, which is dwelt on so much 1 John v. 9—12, where, ver. 10, we have the same ὁ μὴ πιστεύων τῷ θεῷ.

ἔχει ζ. al.: so 1 John v. 12, 13. The πιστεύων and the ἔχει ζ. al. are commensurate:—where the faith is, the possession of eternal life is:—and when the one remits, the other is forfeited. But here the faith is set before us as an enduring faith, and its effects described in their completion (see Eph. i. 19, 20). εἰς κρισιν οὐκ ἔρχεται] κρισίς being the separation,—the effect of which is to gather out of the Kingdom all that offendeth;—and thus regarding especially the damnatory part of judgment,—he who believes comes not into, has no concern with, κρισίς. Compare Ps. cxlii. 2 LXX. The reckoning which ends with εἰ ἀγαθὴ δοῦλε, is not κρισίς: the reward is of free grace. In this sense, the believers in Christ will not be judged according to their works: they are justified before God by faith, and by God—θεὸς ὁ δικαίων, ρίς ὁ κατακρίνων; Their ‘passage over’ from death into life has already taken place,—from the state of spiritual death into that ζωὴ αἰώνιος, which in their believing state they ἔχουσιν already. It is to be observed that our Lord speaks in very similar terms of the unbelieving being condemned already, in ch. iii. 18. The perfect sense of μεταβίβηκεν must not be weakened nor explained away,—see ref.

25.] This verse continues to refer to spiritual awakening from the dead. The ἔρχεται ὅρα κ. νῦν ἐστιν is an expression (see ref.) used of those things which are to characterize the spiritual Kingdom of Christ, which was even now begun among men, but not yet brought (until the day of Pentecost, Acts ii.) to its completion. Thus it cometh, in its fullness,—and even now is begun.

οἱ νεκροί,—in reference to εἰς τὴν the preceding verse—the spirits—see below on ver. 28.

His call to awake, in its deepest sense;—by His own presence His Apostles, His ministers, &c. all these He speaks to the dead. οἱ ἀκούσ., not merely, which would be ‘and have it, shall live:’ but οἱ ἀκούσ., who have heard it (or, who shall live). This determines to be spoken of spiritual, not bodily ing.

οἱ ἀκούσαντες are sons to whom the Lord cried ὁ ἔχων ὦρα ἀκούειν, ἀκούτω: sons who stand opposed to dressed in ver. 40, οὐ θέλει εἰλαμε, ἵνα ζωὴν ἔχητε.

26, 27.] We have here again and κρινειν bound together as great departments of the Son’s work the former, as substantiating the just uttered; the latter, as leading the great announcement of the resurrection. But the two departments spring distinct sources, united in the the Incarnate Son of God. The Father hath given Him to have life in Himself: He is the Son of God. We have us life in ourselves: in Him we move and have our being. But the Father is, is the source of Life again the Father hath given Him to pass judgment, because He is of Man; man is to be judged by that Man whom God hath given: who is the inclusive Head of humankind, and man’s representative by right of covenant-purchase κρίσειν ποιεῖν leads the thought to the great occasion when judgment shall be executed; which accordingly is treated of in the next verse.

29.] μὴ θ., as ch. iii. 7, introduces a matter of even greater wonder to them;—the astounding proof which shall be given in the face of the universe that this is so.

ἔρχεται ὥρα, but not καὶ νῦν ἐστὶν this time,—because He is now speaking of the great day of the resurrection: when not merely οἱ νεκροί, but πάντες οἱ ἐν τοῖς ἡμετέροις, shall hear His voice, and ἀκούσαντες are not specified, because all shall hear in the fullest sense. Observe that here, as elsewhere, when the judgment according to works is spoken of, it is the great general resurrection of Matt. xxv. 31—46, which (and the notes) compare. So here we have not οἱ πιστεύσαντες and οἱ μὴ πιστεύσαντες, but the categories reach far wider, including indeed in this most general form the first resurrection unto life also—and the two great classes are described as οἱ τ. ἀγ. ποιήσαντες and οἱ τὰ φαῦλα πράξαντες.

On the difference between ποιῶ and πράσσω, see note on ch. iii. 20, 21. Observe, that ζῶν and κρῖσις stand opposed here, as in ver. 24:—not that there is no such thing as an ἀνάστασις θανάτου (Schleiermacher, in Stier, iv. 194, edn. 2), but that it is involved in this κρῖσις.

Olahausen observes (ii. 153) that this, and Acts xxiv. 15, are the only direct declarations in the N. T. of a bodily resurrection of the unjust as well as of the just. It is implied in some places, e. g. Matt. x. 28, and less plainly in Matt. xxv. 34 ff.; Rev. xx. 5, 12, and directly asserted in the O. T., Dan. xii. 2. In

1 Cor. xv.,—as the object was to convince believers in Christ of the truth of the resurrection of their bodies,—no allusion is made to those who are not believers.

30.] Here begins (see Stier, iv. 195, edn. 2) the second part of the discourse,—but bound on most closely to the first (ver. 28),—treating of the testimony by which these things were substantiated, and which they ought to have received. This verse is, however, perhaps rather a point of transition to the next, at which the testimony is first introduced.

As the Son does nothing of Himself,—but His working and His judgment all spring from His deep unity of will and being with the Father,—this His great and last judgment, and all His other ones, will be just and holy (He being not separate from God, but one with Him); and therefore His witness given of Himself ver. 17, and called by them blasphemy, is true and holy also.

Observe, the discourse here passes into the first person, which was understood before, because he had called himself the Son of God,—but is henceforth used expressly.

31.] This assertion is not to be trifled away by an accommodation, or supposed to be introduced by 'Ye will say to Me:—see by all means ch. viii. 12—14 and notes.

The words are said in all earnestness, and are strictly true. If such a separation, and independent testimony, as is here supposed, could take place, it would be a falsification of the very conditions of the Truth of God as manifested by the Son, Who being the λόγος, speaks, not of himself, but of the Father. And in this sense ch. viii. 14 is eminently true also, the ὥς being the

Βηθσάδ = Syr. ܡܝܪܝܢܐ, the house (place) of mercy, or of grace. Its present situation is very uncertain. Robinson established by personal inspection the fact of the subterranean connexion of the pool of Siloam (see ch. ix. 7 note) and that called the Fountain of the Virgin (i. 501 ff.); and has made it probable that the Fountain under the grand Moek is also connected with them (i. 509 ff.); in fact that all these are but one and the same spring. (See also some interesting particulars respecting an attempt made subsequently to prove this connexion, and mention of a fourth fountain with the same peculiar taste as the water of Siloam, in Williams's Holy City, pp. 381 ff.) Now this spring, as he himself witnessed, (i. 506,) is an intermittent one, as indeed had been reported before by Jerome (on Isa. viii. 6), Prudentius (in Trench, Mir. p. 247, edn. 2), William of Tyre, and others. There might have been then, it is obvious, some artificially constructed basin in connexion with this spring, the site and memory of which have perished, which would present the phenomenon here described: see below. The spot now traditionally known as Bethesda is a part of the i round the fort or tower Antonia, a manse reservoir or trench, seventy-five deep. But, as Robinson observes (i. 4) there is not the slightest evidence that identify it with the Bethesda of the N

nothing else. In the background, and explanatory of both, was the popular belief of the Jews, not alleged by the evangelist. In very early times, this deficiency was supplied by the insertion of the spurious passage. I say, in very early times: for Tertullian refers to it in a way which leaves no doubt that he read it entire. 'Piscinam Bethsaidam [cf. digest on ver. 2] angelus interveniens commovebat: observabant qui valetudinem querebantur. Nam si quis prævenerat descendere illuc, queri post lavacrum desinebat.' De Bapt. c. 5, p. 1205. So that the fact of so many different kinds of sick persons being mentioned here (Stier), and that of the connexion of the account almost requiring this passage as its explanation (De Wette), points to the reason why it was put in, to clear up a narrative otherwise obscure. I would not lay much stress on the variations in the passage, which are only such as are perpetually meeting us in the undoubted text: but the fact that there are no less than seven words used either here only, or here only in this sense, is strong against its genuineness: as is the concurrence of B, C, D, and N in omitting it. Of N. T. critics, Griesb. brackets it, Tischdf., Meyer, and Treg. omit it,—while Lachm. retains it in his text. De Wette, Lücke, and Luthardt, are undecided, but inclined more or less strongly against it. As a marginal gloss, it certainly does good service, as explaining both the obscure points—the assemblage of sick, and the answer in ver. 7.

κατὰ καιρὸν, here, apparently, at intervals: and those irregular ones, or the sick need not have waited there for them. κατὰ καιρὸν, was in the habit of descending: the imperfects continue throughout.] 5.] There are two ways of taking the construction of ἔχων: (1) to regard ἔχων ἐν τῇ ἁσθενείᾳ as = ἀσθενῶς ἔχων, and τριάντα ὀκτὼ ἐτη as the accus. of duration; which is objectionable on account of the article τῇ, (not on account of the present participle, as De Wette, for it is often found with duration of time,) and as being alien from John's usage, which is (2) to place ἔχω in this sense with an accusative of the time; see reff., and ver. 6. So that the construction is ἔχων τριάκ. ὀκτ. ἐτη ἐν τῇ ἁσθενείᾳ. Observe, he had been lame thirty-eight years, not at Bethesda all that time.

6.] γνοὺς, i. e. ἐν ταύτῃ, as on other similar occasions. Our Lord singled him out, being conscious of the circumstances under which he lay there, by that superhuman knowledge of which we had so striking an example in the case of the woman of Samaria.

Θελεῖς ὑγ. γ.; Lightfoot and Semler would supply, 'licet sit sabbatum.' But this is very improbable, see ver. 17. Our Lord did not thus appeal to his hearers' prejudices, and make His grace dependent on them. Besides, the ὑγιῆς γενέσθαι had in the mind of the man no reference to a healing such as there would be any objection to on the Sabbath; but to the cure by means of the water, which he was there to seek.

The question is one of those by which He so frequently testified his compassion, and established (so to speak) a point of connexion between the spirit of the person addressed, and his own gracious purposes. Possibly it may have conveyed to the mind of the poor cripple the idea that at length a compassionate person had come, who might put him in at the next troubling of the water. It certainly is possible that the man's long and apparently hopeless infirmity may have given him a look of lethargy and despondency, and the question may have arisen from this: but there is no ground for supposing (Schleiermacher) blame conveyed by it, still less that he was an impostor labouring under some trifling complaint (Paulus and others), and wishing to represent it more important than it was.

7.] The man's answer implies the popular belief which the spurious but useful insertion in vv. 3, 4 expresses. Bauer asks why the person who brought him there every day, could not have put him in? But no such person ἄρον τ. κρ. σου has been treated (Stier, iv. 168, edn. 2. Trench, Mir. 251, edn. 2) as making a difference between the man lame from his birth in Acts iii. 8, who walked and leaped and praised God; and this man, who, since sin had been the cause of his disease (ver. 14), is ordered to carry his bed, 'a present memento of his past sin.' Possibly; but our Lord must have had in his view what was to follow, and have ordered it also to bring about this his first open controversy with the Jews.

The bearing of burdens on the Sabbath was forbidden not only by the glosses of the Pharisees, but by the law itself. See Neh. xiii. 15—19; Exod. xxxi. 13—17; Jer. xvii. 21, 22. And our Lord does not, as in another case (Luke xiii. 15, 16), appeal here

13.] Difficulty has been found here from the supposed improbability that some should not have told him, seeing that Jesus was by this time well known in Jerusalem. But this is wholly unnecessary. His fame had not been so spread yet, but that He might during the crowd of strangers at the feast pass unnoticed.

ἐξένευσεν, passed on unobserved: just spoke the healing words, and then went on among the crowd; so that no particular attention was attracted to Himself, either by the sick man or others. The context requires this interpretation: being violated by the ordinary one, that Jesus 'conveyed himself away, because a multitude was in the place:' for that would imply that attention had been attracted towards him which He wished to avoid; and in that case he could hardly fail to have been known to the man and to others. Observe, ἐξένευσεν has for its understood object, the man subjectively;—escaped his notice, a crowd being in the place: not referring to any thing which Jesus had done himself.

14.] The knowledge of our Lord extended even to the sin committed thirty-eight years ago, from which this long sickness had resulted, for so it is implied here. The χεῖρόν τι, as Trench observes (Mir.

254, edn. 2), 'gives us an awful glimpse of the severity of God's judgments;—see Matt. xii. 45.

15.] The man appears to have done this partly in obedience to the authorities; partly perhaps to complete his apology for himself (Bengel). We can hardly imagine ingratitude in him to have been the cause; especially as ὁ ποιήσας αὐτὸν ὑγιῇ speaks so plainly of the benefit received; compare ver. 11 and note.

16.] ἐδίωκον is not used in the sense of legal prosecution in the N. T.:—persecuted is the best word for it.

17.] The true keeping of the rest of the Sabbath was not that otiose and unprofitable cessation from even good deeds, which they would enforce: the Sabbath was made for man;—and, in its Jewish form, for man in a mere state of legal discipline (which truth could not yet be brought out to them, but is implied in this verse, because His people are even as He is—in the liberty wherewith He hath made them free); whereas He, the only-begotten of the Father, doing the works of God in the world, stands on higher ground, and hallow, instead of breaking the Sabbath, by thus working on it. "He is no more a breaker of the Sabbath than God is, when He upholds with an energy that knows no pause the work of His creation from hour to hour, and from moment to moment; 'My Father worketh

hitherto, and I work; My work is but the reflex of His work. Abstinence from outward work belongs not to the idea of a Sabbath, it is only more or less the necessary condition of it for beings so framed as ever to be in danger of losing the true collection and rest of the spirit in the multiplicity of earthly toil and business. Man indeed must cease from his work if a higher work is to find place in him. He scatters himself in his work, and therefore he must collect himself anew, and have seasons for so doing. But with Him who is one with the Father, it is otherwise. In Him the deepest rest is not excluded by the highest activity." (Trench, Mir. p. 257, edn. 2.) 18.] The ground of the charge is now shifted; and by these last words (ver. 17), occasion is given for one of our Lord's most weighty discourses.

The Jews understood His words to mean nothing short of peculiar personal Sonship, and thus equality of nature with God. And that this their understanding was the right one, the discourse testifies. All might in one sense, and the Jews did in a closer sense, call God their, or our, Father; but they at once said that the individual use of 'MY FATHER' by Jesus had a totally distinct, and in their view a blasphemous, meaning: this latter especially, because He thus made God a participator in his crime of breaking the sabbath. Thus we obtain from the adversaries of the faith a most important statement of one of its highest and holiest doctrines. 19.] The discourse is a regarding especially the damnatory part of judgment,—he who believes comes not into,

 has no concern with, κρισίς. Compare Ps. cxlii. 2 LXX. The reckoning which ends with εἰ ἀγαθὸν δοῦλα, is not κρισίς: the re- ward is of free grace. In this sense, the believers in Christ will not be judged according to their works: they are justified before God by faith, and by God—θεὸς ὁ δικαίων, ρίς ὁ κατακρίνων; Their ‘passage over’
 from death into life has already taken place,—from the state of spiritual death into that ζωὴ αἰώνιος, which in their believing state they ἔχουσιν already. It is to be observed that our Lord speaks in very similar terms of the unbelieving being condemned already, in ch. iii. 18. The perfect sense of μεταβέβηκεν must not be weakened nor explained away,—see ref.

25.] This verse continues to refer to spiritual awakening from the dead.
 The ἔρχεται ὅρα κ. νῦν ἐστίν is an expression (see ref.) used of those things which are to characterize the spiritual Kingdom of Christ, which was even now begun among men, but not yet brought (until the day of Pentecost, Acts ii.) to its completion. Thus it cometh, in its fulness,—and even now is begun.

κρίσιν ποιῶν leads the thought to the great occasion when judgment shall be executed; which accordingly is treated of in the next verse.

ἔρχεται ὥρα, but not και νῦν ἐστὶν this time,—because He is now speaking of the great day of the resurrection: when not merely οἱ νεκροί, but πάντες οἱ ἐν τοῖς ἡμνημοῖς, shall hear His voice, and οἱ ἀκούσαντες are not specified, because all shall hear in the fullest sense. Observe that here, as elsewhere, when the judgment according to works is spoken of, it is the great general resurrection of Matt. xxv. 31—46, which (and the notes) compare. So here we have not οἱ πιστεύσαντες and οἱ μὴ πιστεύσαντες, but the categories reach far wider, including indeed in this most general form the first resurrection unto life also—and the two great classes are described as οἱ τ. ἀγ. ποιήσαντες and οἱ τὰ φαῦλα πράξαντες.

On the difference between ποιῶν and πράσσω, see note on ch. iii. 20, 21. Observe, that ζωῆ and κρίσεως stand opposed here, as in ver. 24:—not that there is no such thing as an ἀνάστασις θανάτου (Schleiermacher, in Stier, iv. 194, edn. 2), but that it is involved in this κρίσις. Olshausen observes (ii. 153) that this, and Acts xxiv. 15, are the only direct declarations in the N. T. of a bodily resurrection of the unjust as well as of the just. It is implied in some places, e. g. Matt. x. 28, and less plainly in Matt. xxv. 34 ff.; Rev. xx. 5, 12, and directly asserted in the O. T., Dan. xii. 2. In

1 Cor. xv.,—as the object was to convince believers in Christ of the truth of the resurrection of their bodies,—no allusion is made to those who are not believers.

^{30.}] Here begins (see Stier, iv. 196, edn. 2) the second part of the discourse,—but bound on most closely to the first (ver. 23),—treating of the testimony by which these things were substantiated, and which they ought to have received. This verse is, however, perhaps rather a point of transition to the next, at which the testimony is first introduced.

As the Son does nothing of Himself,—but His working and His judgment all spring from His deep unity of will and being with the Father,—this His great and last judgment, and all His other ones, will be just and holy (He being not separate from God, but one with Him); and therefore His witness given of Himself ver. 17, and called by them blasphemy, is true and holy also.

Observe, the discourse here passes into the first person, which was understood before, because he had called himself the Son of God,—but is henceforth used expressly.

^{31.}] This assertion is not to be trifled away by an accommodation, or supposed to be introduced by 'Ye will say to Me:—see by all means ch. viii. 12—14 and notes.

The words are said in all earnestness, and are strictly true. If such a separation, and independent testimony, as is here supposed, could take place, it would be a falsification of the very conditions of the Truth of God as manifested by the Son, Who being the λόγος, speaks, not of himself, but of the Father. And in this sense ch. viii. 14 is eminently true also, the φῶς being the

³³.] ἄλλος can, by the inner coherence of the discourse, be no other than THE FATHER, of Whom so much has been said in the former part, but Who is hinted at rather than mentioned in this (πατὴρ in ver. 30 is spurious). It cannot be John,—from whom (ver. 34) our Lord took not his testimony. Similar modes of alluding to the Father occur ch. viii. 50: see also ch. viii. 18, and Matt. x. 28 and ||. Many interpreters however understand it of John,—Chrysostom, Nonnus, Theophylact, Euthym.:—and lately De Wette has defended the view with some acuteness. But he has certainly missed the inner coherence of the passage. The reason why our Lord mentions John is not ‘as ascending from the lesser witness to the greater,’ but purposely to remove the idea that He meant him only or principally by these words, and to set his testimony in its right place: then at ver. 36 He returns again to the ἄλλος παρ. περὶ ἐμοῦ. καὶ οἶδα . . .]

This is the Son’s testimony to the Father’s truth: see ch. (iii. 33) vii. 28; viii. 26, 55. It testifies to the full consciousness on the part of the Son, even in the days of his humiliation, of the righteousness of the Father: and (for the testimony of the Father to the Son is contained in the Scriptures) also to His distinct recognition and approval (Ps. xl. 6—8) of psalm and type and prophecy, as applied to Himself and His work. ³³.] See ch. i. 19.

The connexion is,—another testifies of Me (ver. 32).—‘not John only, although he, when sent to, did certainly testify to the truth; for’ &c. τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, not merely (Grot.) ‘modeste dictum;’—but necessarily. ἐμοὶ would have been asserting what the next verse denies. ³⁴.] ‘I take my testimony (the testimony to Me of I have spoken) from man, but I me John’s testimony, that you may make intended use of it, to be led to My salvation.’ ³⁵.] This ἦν shew Stier rightly observes, that John was cast into prison, if not executed.

λύχνος.] The article has been taken some (e.g. Bengel, Lücke, Stier) to the prophecies concerning John. we have no passage in the O. T. v designates Elias in such terms. In Sirach we read of him, ἀνίστη προφ ὡς πῦρ, καὶ ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ ὡς λα, ἐκαίετο, which Stier thinks may be referred to here. We may, as indeed he also guesses, believe that those words represent gave rise to a common way of speaking Elias, as certain Rabbis were called candle of the Law,’ &c. (Lightf.) Wette takes the article as meaning, lamp which was to lead you,’ &c.

καίόμενος, not καίων, as it is ὁ λῦ: not τὸ φῶς: lumen illuminatum, not illuminans: see note on Matt. v. 14. καὶ φαίνων (lit up), and shining. description sets forth the derived, transitory nature of John’s light.

true to him, did not follow his direction to Christ. For the mass of the people, and their leaders, his mission was in vain (Lücke, ii. 75).

38. ἔγω τὴν μ. μείζων literally, I have my witness greater (μείζων being probably a solecism like πλήρης in ch. i. 14, a nominative in concord with an accusative) . . . τοῦ ἰωάννου, not, 'than that of John';—but, than John himself. John was a testimony.

τὰ γὰρ ἔργα, not His miracles alone, although those principally; but the whole of His life and course of action, full as it was of holiness, in which, and as forming harmonious parts of which, His miracles were testimonies of His divine mission. His greatest work (ch. vi. 29) was the awakening of faith, the ζωοποιεῖν of which we have heard before, to which the miracles were but as means to an end.

ἃ δέδωκεν . . . ἵνα τελ.: see ch. xvii. 4 and note. αὐτὰ τ. ἔργα ἃ ποιῶ]

The repetition is to shew that His life and working was an exact fulfilment of the Father's will. The works which the Father hath given Me to do, those very works which I am doing, . . .

37—39.] The connexion of these verses has been much disputed. I believe it will be found to be this: 'The works of which I have spoken, are only indirect testimonies; the Father Himself, who sent Me, has given direct testimony concerning Me. Now that testimony cannot be derived by you, nor any man, by direct communication with Him; for ye have never heard His voice nor seen His shape. (Or perhaps have not heard His voice, as your fathers did from Sinai,—nor seen His visional appearance, as the Prophets did.) Nor (ver. 38), in your case, has it been given by that inward witness (ch. iii. 33; 1 John iv. 13, 14) which those have (and had in a measure, even before the gift of the Spirit—see inter al., Ps. li. 11), in whom His word abides; for ye have not His word abiding in you, not believing on Him whom He hath sent. Yet (ver. 39) there is a form of this direct testimony of the Father, accessible even to you;—“search the Scriptures,” &c. Chrysostom, Euthymius, Lampe, Bengel, &c., understand φωνή to refer to the voice at our Lord's baptism: but, as Lücke observes, πώπορε forbids this. I may also add that the perfect, απηκοαρε, excludes it. Had reference been to a distinct event, it must have been ἠκούσατε,—and (Lücke) τὴν φωνήν.

Observe that the testimony in the Scriptures is not the only, nor the chief one, intended in ver. 37, but (as De Wette well maintains) the direct testimony in the heart of the believer;—which, as the Jews have not, they are directed to another form of the Father's testimony, that in the Scriptures.

ἐραυνάτε, either indicative (Cyril, Erasmus, Beza, Lampe, Bengel, Kuinoel, Lücke, Tholuck, Olshausen, De Wette), 'Ye search the Scriptures, for ye believe ye have &c., and they are they that testify of Me: and (yet, ver. 40) ye will not come to Me that ye may have life:' or imperative (Chrys., Theophyl., Euthym., August., Luther, Calvin, Wetst., Paulus, Stier), in which case generally a period has been placed after ἐμοῦ, and a fresh sentence begins at καὶ οὐ θάλ. I believe the imperative sense only will be found to cohere with the previous verses:—see above, where I have given the context. And no other sense will suit the word ἐραυνᾶτε, which cannot be used, as in the indicative it would be, with blame attached to it,—‘ye make nice and frivolous search into the letter of Scripture;’ but, as ἐκτείνω in ref. Ps., implies a thorough search (see also 1 Pet. i. 11) into the contents and spirit of Scripture. Besides, the emphatic position of ἐραυνᾶτε before τὰς γραφάς, while it does not absolutely necessitate the imper. sense, makes it much more probable than the indic., which would be conveyed by τὰς γρ. ἐραυνᾶτε. Luthardt (ii. 31) remarks, that the almost unanimous verdict of the Greek Fathers (Cyril however is a remarkable exception) for the imper. decides him in its favour.

δοτε ὑμ. δοκ.] Ye (emphatic) imagine that in them (emphatic) ye have eternal life (Schöttgen quotes testimonies from the Rabbis: ‘Qui acquirit sibi verba legis, is acquirit sibi vitam æternam, &c.’)—but they, like all other secondary ordinances, have a spiritual end in view, and that end is to testify, from first to last (it is their office, i.e. εἰσιν αἱ μαρτυροῦσαι) of ME. 40.] I would connect these words with the former, and regard them as describing the inconsistency of those who think that they ζωὴν ἔχουσιν in the Scriptures, and yet will not come to Him of whom they testify, ἵνα ζωὴν ἔχωσιν. So that καὶ will be spoken in a fine irony, And ye will not come to Me! Observe, this command to the Jews to search their Scriptures, applies à fortiori to Christians; who are yet, like them, in danger of idolizing a mere written book, believing that in the Bible they have eternal life, and missing the personal knowledge of Him of whom the Scriptures testify.

The οὐ here sets forth strikingly the free the will, on which the unbeliever’s demnation rests: see ch. iii. 19.

41–44.] The connexion seems to the standing-points of our Lord and Jews were not only different, but inconsistent with and exclusive of another. He sought not glory from man’s praise or report: the I testified to Him, in all the ways which been specified; but this testimony could not receive, nor discover Him in Scriptures, because human regards at ambition and intrigue had blinded them and they had not the love of God very first command in their law, De 4, 5) in their hearts.

οὐ λαμβάνω, ‘I do not desire,’ ‘non capio’ but, ‘I do not receive;’—‘no such nor testimony accrues to Me, nor I Me that on which it can lay hold.’ glory is altogether from another & ἀγάπην] Luthardt remarks haps refining somewhat too much, ἀγάπην, because ‘the love which ye to have’ is imported: τοῦ θεοῦ—of your God, the God of Israel.’ So the words are spoken, not of an un mind in general, but of an absence of love which God’s covenant people have for Him. ‘They would not Jesus: for they were not true Israel. This love, if they had it, would teach—the whole heart, and soul, and and strength being given to God,—honour only from Him,—and thus appreciate the glory which He hath given His Son, and His testimony concerning Him. 43.] The first clause is

In the latter we have a prophetic declaration regarding the Jews in the latter days. This ἄλλος is in strong contrast with the ἄλλος of ver. 32. 'The testimony of that Other, who is greater than I, ye will not receive; but if another come in his own name, him ye will receive.' The words are perhaps spoken primarily of the false or Idol-Messiah, the Antichrist, who shall appear in the latter days (2 Thess. ii. 8—12); whose appearance shall be κατ' ἐνέργειαν τοῦ σατανᾶ (their father, ch. viii. 44), ἀποδεικνύς αὐτὸν ὅτι ἐστὶν θεός, 2 Thess. ii. 4;—and, doubtless, is that their final reference, embrace also all the cases in which the Jews have more or less received those false Messiahs who have been foreshadowers of the great Antichrist, and indeed all the cases in which such a spirit has been shewn by them, even in the absence of false Messiahs. 44.] πῶς δύνασθε (emphatic) is grounded on οὐ θέλετε—is the consequence of the carnal regards in which they lived.

λαμβάνοντες here implies 'captantes' also. παρὰ τοῦ μόνου θεοῦ, not 'from God only' (E. V. and De Wette), which is ungrammatical (requiring μόνου to be either after θεοῦ, see Matt. iv. 4; xii. 4; xvii. 8, or before τοῦ θεοῦ, Luke v. 21; vi. 4; Heb. ix. 7. Lücke); but from the only God: in contradistinction to the idolatry of the natural heart, which is ever setting up for itself other sources of honour, worshipping man, or self,—or even, as in the case alluded to in the last verse, Satan,—instead of God. The words τοῦ μόνου θεοῦ are very important, because they form the point of passage to the next verses; in which the Jews are accused of not believing the writings of Moses, the very pith and kernel of which was the unity of God, and the having no other gods but Him. 45.] The work of Christ is not κατηγορεῖν, even as He is Judge;—but κρίνειν, by the appointment of the Father. And therefore—though He has said so much of the unbelief of the Jews, and charged them in the last verse with breach of the central law of God—He will not accuse them; nay, it is not needful;—for Moses, whom they disbelieved, while vainly hoping in him (see above on ver. 39),—ἐκαναπαυόμενοι νόμῳ, Rom. ii. 17,—already accused them: see Deut. xxxi. 21, 26, and ch. vii. 19. 46.] The former part of this verse should not be rendered as in E. V. "had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me;" but if ye believed Moses, ye would believe me. The imperfects render this necessary: the other rendering would require aorists. περὶ ἐμοῦ ἔγραψεν—'nusquam non.' Bengel.

This is an important testimony by the Lord to the subject of the whole Pentateuch;—it is περὶ ἐμοῦ. It is also a testimony to the fact, of Moses having written those books, which were then, and are still, known by his name. 47.] γράμματα here does not =, in the sense, γραφαίς: for ταῖς ἐκείνων γραφαῖς could not be used;—the γραφή being ἡ θεία γραφή, not (ἡ τοῦ) Μωυσέως γραφή,—but the γράμματα were those of Moses; the outward expression of the γραφή,—the letters, and words, as found on paper;—just as the ῥήματα in the other case are the outward expression of the λόγος. The meaning is: 'men give greater weight to what is written and published, the letter of a book, than to mere word of mouth;—and ye in particular give greater honour to Moses, than to Me: if then ye believe not what he has written, which comes down to you hallowed by the reverence of ages,—how can you believe the words which are uttered by Me, to whom you are hostile?" This however is not all:—Moses leads to Christ:—is one of the witnesses by which the Father hath testified of Him: 'if then ye have rejected the means, how shall ye reach the end?' 'If your unbelief has stopped the path, how shall ye arrive at Him to whom it leads?' Meyer is quite right in maintaining that the opposition does not lie between ῥήμασιν and ἑκείνου, but between ἑκείνου and τοῖς ἰμοῖς. Those who can, should by all means consult Stier, whose exposition of the above important discourse is very elaborate and valuable;—Reden Jesu, vol. iv. pp. 170—233, 2nd edit.

CHAP. VI. JESUS THE LIFE IN THE FLESH. 1—15.] Miraculous feeding of five thousand men. Matt. xiv. 13—21. Mark vi. 30—44. Luke ix. 10—17, in each of which compare the notes throughout. Here we have another example of John relating a miracle with the view of introducing a discourse, and that discourse carries on the testimony of Jesus to Himself. In the last, He was the SON of GOD, testified to by the Father, received by faith, rejected by unbelief: here He is SON OF MAN, the incarnate Life of the world, and we have the unbelief of the Jews and His own disciples set in strong contrast with the feeding on and participating in Him as the Bread of Life.

1.] μετὰ ταῦτα gives us no fixed date;—see on ch. v. 1. As Lücke remarks, the ἀπὸ τοῦ περὶ τῆς θ. . . ., if connected with the preceding discourse, would be unintelligible,—and can only be understood by the fragmentary character of this Gospel as relates to mere narration, and the well-known fact being presupposed, that His Ministry principally took place in Galilee.

Matt. gives this passage over the lake in connexion with the execution of John the Baptist: Mark and Luke, with the return of the Twelve from their mission. (The Twelve were probably gathered, or their gathering finished, in the interval since ch. v. 47, during which time their mission also had taken place.)

τῆς Γ. τῆς Τιβ.] The last appellation is probably inserted for the sake of Gentile readers, to whom it was best known by that name: thus Pausan. v. 7. 3, αὐτὸς οἶδα Ἰόρδανον λίμνην Τιβεριδα ὀνομαζομένην διοιέοντα: but it was more usually called, as by Josephus, Γεννησάρ or Γεννησαρίτις, 1 Macc. xi. 67, Strabo xvi. 2 (Ptolem. v. 15, Lücke). τῆς Τιβ. cannot mean that He came from Tiberias, however true that may have been. That would have been ἀπὸ or ἐκ Τιβεριάδος. It is possible, though not likely, that τῆς Τιβ. may have been a gloss, and have found its way into the text very early. But at all events we must not adopt the reading of D, &c. εἰς τὰ μέρη Γ. Τιβ.,—for the fact was just otherwise; compare vv. 2 and 23.

2.] It is evident from this that a circuit in Galilee and works of healing are presupposed (see Matt. ver. 13; Mark, ver. 33; Luke, ver. 11).

3.] τὸ ὄρος, perhaps 'the hill country' on the shore of the lake = ἱερμον τόπον κατ' ἰδιαν, Matt. The expression is used by John only here and in ver. 15, but no inference can be drawn from that, for this is the only portion of the Galilean Ministry related by him.

4.] This will account, not for so great a multitude coming to Him, but perhaps(?) for the circumstance that the people at that time were gathered in multitudes, ready to set out on their journey to Jerusalem. We must remember also that the reference of the following discourse to the Passover being so pointed, the remark would naturally be here inserted by the Evangelist: but I would not, with Luthardt (i. 80; ii. 41) insist on this as the only reason for his making it. 5.] Here there is considerable difficulty, on account of the variation from Matt., Mark, and Luke, who relate that the disciples came to the Lord after He had been teaching and healing the multitudes, and when it was now evening,—and asked Him to dismiss the multitudes, that they might buy food;—whereupon He commanded, 'Give ye them to eat;—whereas here apparently, on their first coming, the Lord Himself suggests the question, How they were to be fed, to Philip. This difference is not to be passed over, as it has usually been by English Commentators, without notice. Still less are we to invent improbable and hardly honest harmonistic shifts to piece the two narratives together. There can be no doubt, fairly and honestly speaking, that the narratives, in their mere letter, disagree. But those who are not slaves to the mere letter will see here that inner and deeper accordance of which Augustine (de Consensu Evang. ii. 46) speaks in commenting on this passage: 'Ex qua universa varietate verborum, rerum autem sententiarumque concordia, satis apparet salubriter nos doceri, nihil querendum in verbis nisi loquentium voluntatem; cui demonstrandæ invigilare debent omnes veridici narratores, cum de homine vel de angelo vel de Deo aliquid narrant.'

I repeat the remark so often made in this Commentary,—that if we were in possession of the facts as they happened, there is no doubt that the various forms of the literal narrations would fall into their places, and the truthfulness of each historian would be apparent:—but as we cannot at present reconcile them in this way, the humble and believing Christian will not be tempted to handle the word of God deceitfully, but to admire the gracious condescension which has given us the evidence of so many independent witnesses, whose very difference in detail makes their accordance in the great central truths so much the more weighty. On every point of importance here, the four sacred historians are entirely and absolutely agreed. That every minor detail related by them had its ground in historical fact, we fully believe; it is the tracking it to this ground in each case, which is now beyond our power; and here comes in the simplicity and reliance of faith: and the justification of those who believe and receive each Gospel as they find it written.

πρὸς Φ.] Why to Philip, does not appear; perhaps some reason lay in the παράδειον αὐτόν, which is now lost to us. From his words in ch. xiv. 8, we cannot infer, as has been done by Cyril Alex. (in Cramer's Catena) and others, that he was weaker in faith, or tardier in spiritual apprehension, than the rest. Of all the Apostles who appear in the sacred narrative, something might be quoted shewing equal unreadiness to believe and understand. I would take the circumstance as simple matter of fact, implying perhaps that Philip was nearest to our Lord at the moment. We must not fall into the mistake of supposing that Philip being of Bethsaida the city of Andrew and Peter (ch. i. 45) throws any light on the question: for the Bethsaida near which our Lord now was, Luke ix. 10, was another place, see notes there. πρόθεν— were a paschal caravan (?), or parts of many such, would not be likely to be very numerous;—and here again we have a point of minute truthfulness brought out.

11.] On the process of the miracle, see notes on Matt. John describes the διάδοσις as being the act of the Lord Himself, and leaves the intervention of the disciples to be understood.

εὐχαριστήσας here answers to εὐλόγησεν in the other Gospels. It was the 'grace' of the father of the family; perhaps the ordinary one in use among the Jews. John seems to connect with it the idea brought out by Luke, εὐλ. αὐτοῦ, i. e. τοῦ ἀρτου: see ver. 23.

12.] Peculiar to John. The command, one end of which was certainly to convince the disciples of the power which had wrought the miracle, is given by our Lord a moral bearing also. They collected the fragments for their own use, each in his κόφινος, the ordinary furniture of the travelling Jew ('quorum corporibus sanumque suppellex,' Juv. Sat. iii. 14), to carry his food, lest he should be polluted by that of the people through whose territory he passed; see note on Matt. xv. 32. Observe, that here the 12 baskets are filled with the fragments of the bread alone: but in Mark, with those of the fishes also.

We must not altogether miss the reference to the 12 tribes of Israel, typifying the church which was to be fed with the bread of life to the end of time.

14.] On δ προσφ. see note on ch. i. 21,—δ προσφ. εἰ σὺ; 15.] After such a recognition, nothing was wanting but that the multitudes who were journeying to the Passover should take Jesus with them and proclaim Him king of the Jews in the holy City itself. solutely necessary to account for the οὖν, and quite in accordance with John's usage of θέλω (see reff.). Some of the German Commentators (even De Wette among them) have created a difficulty, by strangely rendering ἠθελον, 'they wished' (implying, 'but did not'), but (καὶ) the ship was immediately, &c.—i. e. they were already close to the land, and so there was no occasion. Prof. Bleek (Beiträge, pp. 103, 4) half adopts this view;—adding to it, I am sorry to see, that perhaps Jesus was on the land, and the disciples in the storm and darkness thought Him to be on the sea.

^{22—59.} The multitudes follow Jesus to Capernaum, where, in the synagogue, He discourses to them on himself as the Bread of Life.

^{22—24.} These verses are involved and parenthetical in construction, but very characteristic of the minute care with which the Evangelist will account for every circumstance which is essential to his purpose in the narrative. ὁ ὄχλος] We are not to understand the whole multitude who were fed,—but that portion of them which had remained on the coast over the night. the west bank;—we have been crossing the sea with the multitude. πότε, as Stier remarks, includes πῶς in its meaning. Our Lord leaves the question unanswered, because it was not for a sign to these people that He had miraculously crossed the lake.

26.] The seeking Him, on the part of these people,—to Him, who saw the hearts,—was merely a low desire to profit by his wonderful works,—not a reasonable consequence of deduction from his miracles that He was the Saviour of the world. And from this low desire of mere satisfaction of their carnal appetite, He takes occasion in the following discourse to raise them to spiritual desire after HIMSELF, THE BREAD OF LIFE. The discourse forms a parallel with that in ch. iv. 27.] ἐργάζεσθαι, imperative: another instance of the construction which I have advocated in ch. v. 39. The E. V., 'Labour not for,' does not give the sense of ἐργάζεσθαι. They had not laboured in this case for the βρώσιν ἀπολλυμένην, but it had been furnished miraculously. A better rendering would be, Busy not yourselves about,—Do not weary yourselves for,—which they were doing, by thus coming after our Lord. τὴν ἀπολλ. 'whose nourishing power passes away,' De Wette. Rather perhaps more literally, which perisheth, E. V.:—the useless part of it, in being cast out;—the useful, in becoming part of the body which perishes (see 1 Cor.

ἀλλὰ τ. βρ.) It is important to bear in mind that the ἐργάζεσθαι of above, which also applies to τί not a 'working for,' or 'bringing off,' but a following Christ in order to obtain, by following after Him. And thus μὴ . . . ἀλλά keeps in literal force, Do not . . . but. τὴν μὲν εἰς ζ. αἰ. see ch. iv. 14. βρώσιν; remains to eternal life, it is spiritual food. ἦν . . . δώσει ch. iv. 14. ἦν agrees with βρώσιν with ζωὴν. δώσει, future, because great Sacrifice was not yet offered ch. iv. ὁ υἱὸς τ. ἀνθρώπου, en here and belonging to this discourse since it is of His Flesh that about to speak. τοῦτον γὰρ

For Him hath the Father sealed God. ἐσφράγισεν, by undoubtedly testimony, as at His baptism; and so His miracles, see ch. x. 36: not, 'with the image of His Person,' which altogether beside the present subject inconsistent with the meaning of σφραγίσαι. 28.] The people understand ἐργάζεσθαι literally, and dwell upon They quite seem to think that τὴν which is to endure for ever is to ritually interpreted; and they therefore this question,—referring the ἐργάζεσθαι works of the law. τὰ ἔργα τὰ which God works,' but, as in Jer. xlviii. 10 (xxxi. 10 LXX); 1 Cor. xv. 58, the works well pleasing to God. 29.]

The meaning is not,—that faith is wrought in us by God, is the work of God; but that the truest way of working the work of God is to believe on Him whom He hath sent.

ἔργον, not ἱργα, because there is but this one, properly speaking, and all the rest are wrapt up in it (see James i. 25).

This is a most important saying of our Lord, as containing the germ of that teaching afterwards so fully expanded in the writings of Paul. "I know not," says Schleiermacher (cited by Stier, iv. 231, edn. 2), "where we can find any passage, even in the writings of the Apostles, which says so clearly and significantly, that all eternal life in men proceeds from nothing else than faith in Christ." 30, 31.] This answers to ch. iv. 12, 'Art thou greater than our father Jacob,' &c. It is spoken in unbelief and opposition; not, as many have supposed, as a request for the Bread of Life, meaning it by the sign, but in the ordinary sign-seeking spirit of the Jews.

Stier says well, 'They have been hesitating between better and worse thoughts, till at last unbelief prevails.' The σημεῖον here demanded is the sign from heaven, the proof of the sealing by God; such a proof would be, in their estimation, compared with His present miracles, as the manna (bread from heaven) was, compared to the multiplied loaves and fishes. The manna was extolled by the Jews as the greatest miracle of Moses. Josephus calls it θεῖον καὶ παράδοξον βρώμα: see also Wisd. xvi. 20, 21. 'They forgot that their fathers disbelieved Moses almost from the time when they began to eat the manna; and that the Psalm from which they quote most strongly sets forth this;—that they despised the manna, and preferred ordinary meat to it.' Stier. Observe our Lord's πιστ. εἰς and then πιστ. σοι. The former, the casting their whole hopes and faith on Him, is what He requires: but they will not even give the latter, common credence, to Him.

Their τί ἐργάζῃ; Meyer remarks, is a retort of our Lord's question, ver. 27. There is no οὐ expressed, but the stress is on the τί. 32.] Our Lord lays open the course of their argum^t. They have not mentioned Moses,—nor was the giving of the manna a miracle performed by Moses;—but He knew that the comparison between Moses and Himself was in their minds, and answers by exposing the error which represented Moses as the giver of the manna. Neither again was that the true bread from heaven. It was, in one sense, bread from heaven;—but not in this sense. It was a type and shadow of the true bread from heaven, which My Father is giving (δίδωσιν,—or perhaps the abstract present,—giveth) to you. Our Lord does not here deny, but asserts the miraculous character of the manna. 33.] ὁ ἄρτος τοῦ θεοῦ = ὁ ἄρτος ὃν δίδωσιν ὁ πατήρ μου. The words ὁ καταβ. . . . are the predicate of ὁ ἄρτος, and do not apply, in the construction of this verse, to Christ personally, however truly they apply to Him in fact. The E. V. is here wrong: it should be, The bread of God is that (not He) which cometh, &c. Not till ver. 35 does Jesus first say, 'I AM the bread of life.' The manna is still kept in view—ὅταν κατίβῃ ἡ ὁρόσος. . . . κατίβαιναν τὸ μάννα ἐκ' αὐτῆς, Num. xi. 9. And the present participle, here used in reference to the manna, is dropped when the Lord Himself is spoken of: see vv. 38, 41, 58, and especially the distinction between ver. 50 and ver. 51 (so Lücke, De Wette, Stier, Bengel). 34.] ch. iv. 15 is exactly parallel. The Jews understand this bread, as the Samaritan woman understood the water, to be some miraculous kind of sustenance which would bestow life everlasting:—perhaps they thought of the heavenly manna, which the Rabbis speak of as prepared for the just in the future world;—see quotations in Lücke, ii. 132, also Rev. ii. 17. πάντοτε, emphatic:—not now only, but always.

35.] As in ch. v. 30, so here, our Lord passes from the indirect to the direct form of speech. Henceforward it is 'I,' 'Me,' throughout the discourse. In the genitive τῆς ζωῆς is implied ὁ καταβάς ἐκ τοῦ οὐρ. καὶ ζωὴν διδόντος τ. εἰσόν. So ὕδωρ ζωῆς in ch. iv. On the assurance of never hungering or thirsting, see note at ch. iv. 14. It is possible that our Lord placed the all-satisfying bread of life in contrast to the manna, which was no sooner given, Exod. xvi., than the people began to thirst, Exod. xvii.;—but I would not lay any stress on this. ὁ ἐρχόμε. πρ. ἐμὲ is in the same sense as in ch. v. 40—that of acceptance of and faith in Him. 36.] εἶπον ὑμῖν—πότε capricious, nor even of His own arbitrary choice; but as He came into the world to do the Father's will, and that will is that all who come to Him by faith shall have life, so He receives all such;—loses none of them;—and will raise them all up (here, in the full and blessed sense) at the last day. (ἀπολίσσω again is not 'destroy,' 'condemn,' but lose: see ch. xii. 25; xvii. 12. ἵνα μὴ ἐξ ἐμῆς αἰρίας ἀπόληται τις, Euthym.) Olshausen remarks, that 'in ch. iv. we had only the inexhaustible refreshing of the soul by the water of life; but this discourse goes further;—that not even death itself shall destroy the body of him who has been nourished by this bread of life' (ii. 167).

ἀναστήσω refers to the only resurrection which is the completion of the man in his glorified state;—it does not set aside the ἀνάστασις ἐμίσως, but that very term is a debasement of ἀνάστασις: its true sense is only ἀνάστασις ζωῆς.

Bengel has beautifully given the connexion of this last promise with what went before: "hic finis est, ultra quem periculum nullum." But there is much more than this in it. In this declaration (vv. 39, 40) is contained the key of the following discourse, vv. 44—59. The end of the work of God, as regards man, is the glorification of his restored and sanctified nature,—body, soul, and spirit,—in eternity. Without this,—salvation, restitution, would be incomplete. The adoption cannot be consummated without the redemption of the body. Rom. viii. 18—23. And the glorification of the body, soul, and spirit,—of the whole man,—cannot take place but by means of the glorified Body of the second Adam. 'He who does not see this, will never understand either the Holy Communion, or this testimony of the Lord in its inner meaning.' Stier, iv. 243, edn. 2.

The θεωρῶν here is a different thing from the mere ὁρᾶν of ver. 36. It is the awakening of the attention preparatory to faith, answering to the looking on the serpent of brass: τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς τῆς ψυχῆς, Euthym.; but afterwards he makes the θεωρῶν = πιστεύειν, to which it is only preparatory. 41.] Not different here change: they were the same,—perhaps the principal among them, the official superintendents of the synagogue:—for John generally uses οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι in this official sense. 42.] They rightly supposed that this καταβῆναι ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ must imply some method of coming into the world diverse from ordinary generation.

Meyer gathers from the οἶδαμεν, that our Lord's reputed father was then still alive. But surely the verb will bear the sense of knowing as matter of fact who they were, and need not be confined to personal knowledge. 43.] Our Lord does not answer their objection, because it lay far from His present purpose to disclose aught of those mysteries which the answer must have indicated. It was not till the faith of the apostolic Christians was fully fixed on Him as the Son of God, and the outline of the doctrine of His Person was firmly sketched out, that the Spirit brought out those historical records which assure us of His supernatural conception (see Nitzsch, cited by Stier, iv. 244, edn. 2).

44.] The connexion seems to be this: They were not to murmur among themselves because He had said this; for the right understanding of what He had said is only to be gained by being taught of God, by being drawn by the Father, who alone can give the desire to come to Christ, and bring a man to Him. That this 'drawing' is not irresistible grace, is confessed even by Augustine himself, in his Tractatus on this passage. 'Si trahitur, ait aliquis, invitus venit. Si invitus venit, nec credit: si non credit, nec venit. Non enim ad Christum ambulando currimus, sed credendo; nec motu corporis sed voluntate cordis accedimus. . . . Noli te cogitare invitum trahi;

trahitur animus et amore.' And fore: 'Intrare quisquam ecclesiam nolens, accedere ad altare potest accipere sacramentum potest nolens dere non potest, nisi volens.' He 'trahit sua quemque voluptas' (Vi ii. 65), to shew that the drawing is delight and choice, not of obligation necessity. Calvin (?), Beza, and understand irresistible grace to I meant: 'Falsum est et profanum nisi volentes trahi' (Calv., Lücke, note). The Greek expositors, Cyril soston, Euthymius, Theophylact, view which I have adopted above. soston says, δ καὶ αὐτὸ ὅδ' ὁ ἱ ἀναίρει, ἀλλὰ πᾶλλον ἐμποιεῖ βοηθείας διδόνων. opening the eyes of the mind by divine teaching.

ἀκούσας κ. μαθὼν is an expansion of διδακτός. ἐρχ. πρὸς με] This is the final decision of the human will, acted on by the divine attraction to Christ. The beginning is, The Father draws him: the progress, he hears and learns—here is the consenting will—‘Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth:’—the end, he cometh to Christ—here is the will acting on the whole man.

⁴⁶.] The connexion is: the mention of ἀκούσας παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς might lead them to think of a personal communication from the Father to each man, and thus the necessity of the mission of the Son might be invalidated. This was the only way in which a Jew could misunderstand ver. 45; he could not dream of a seeing of the Father with bodily eyes.

ὁ ὢν παρὰ τ. θεοῦ, is Jesus Himself; see ch. vii. 29. His knowledge of the Father is complete and immediate; ours, partial, and derived through Him only.

⁴⁷.] Our Lord now recurs to the subject of their murmurs, and gives the answer for which He has been preparing the way, repeating nearly ver. 40, and adding, ⁴⁸.] If so, (see ver. 47,) there is full reason for my naming Myself the Bread of Life.

⁴⁹.] That bread from heaven had no power to keep off death, and that, death owing to unbelief:—our Lord by thus mentioning οἱ πατέρες ὑμῶν and their death, certainly hints at the similar unbelief of these Jews. And the same dubious sense of ἀποθάνῃ prevails in ver. 50. Death is regarded as being swallowed up in the glory of the resurrection, and the second death—which was hidden in the former ἀπέθανον—has over him who eats this Bread of Life, no power: nay, he is brought, even here, into a resurrection state from sin and death; see Rom. vi. init. and Col. iii. init.

Some difficult questions arise regarding the sense and reference of this saying of our Lord. (1) Does it refer to His DEATH? and, (2) is there any reference to the ORDINANCE OF THE LORD'S SUPPER?

(1) In treating this question I must at once reject all metaphorical and side-interpretations, as, that the teaching of Christ is the Bread, and to be taught by Him is feeding upon it (so Grotius, and the modern rationalists): that the divine Nature of Christ, or His sending of the Holy Spirit, or His whole life of doing good on earth, can be meant: all such have against them the plain sense of the words, which, as Stier observes, are very simple ordinary words; the only difficulty arising, when we come to enquire into their application to His own Person. The Bread of Life is Himself: and, strictly treated, when we come to enquire what, of that body, soul, and spirit, which constituted Himself, this Bread specifically is, we have His answer that it is His Flesh which He will give (for this will be the meaning, whether the words ην εγω δωσω are to be regarded as part of the text or not) on behalf of the life of the world. We are then specifically directed to His Flesh as the answer. Then, what does that Flesh import? The flesh of animals is the ordinary food of men: but not the blood. The blood, which is the life, is spilt at death, and is not in the flesh when eaten by us. Now this distinction must be carefully borne in mind. The flesh here, (see ver. 53,) and the eating of the flesh, are distinct from the blood, and the drinking of the blood. We have no generalities merely, to interpret as we please: but the terms used are precise and technical. It is then only through or after the Death of the Lord, that by any propriety of language, His Flesh could be said to be eaten. Then another distinction must be remembered: The flesh of animals which we eat is dead flesh. It is already the prey of corruption; we eat it, and die (ver. 49). But this Bread, is living Bread; not dead flesh, but living Flesh. And therefore manducation by the teeth materially is not to be thought of here; but some kind of eating by which the living Flesh of the Son of God is made the living sustenance of those who partake of it. Now His Flesh and Blood were sundered by Death. Death was the shedding of His precious Blood, which He did not after- wards resume: see ch. xx. 27, an xxiv. 39. His Flesh is the glorification of His Resurrection-Body, the right hand of God. It is then Resurrection form only that His F be eaten, and be living food for the man. I cannot therefore see how thing short of His Death can be meant. By that Death, He has given Flesh for the life of the world: not that they who believe on Him may, highest sense, have life; but that He may have life. The very existence the created world is owing to, as together by, that Resurrection-Body Lord. In Him all things are gathered together and reconciled to God: καὶ ἐν αὐτῷ συνόλσθησαν, Col. i. 17. (2) The question whether there is here reference to the ORDINANCE of LORD'S SUPPER, has been inaccurately put. When cleared of inaccurate terms, it will mean, Is the subject dwelt upon, the same as that which dwells forth in the ordinance of the Lord's Supper? And of this there can surely be no doubt. To the ordinance itself, there here no reference; nor could there have been any. But the spiritual which underlies the ordinance is of the same with that here insisted on and so considered, the discourse is, as generally treated, most important towards a true understanding of the ordinance. the history of the exegesis of this passage see Lücke ii. pp. 149—159 (3rd ed. Excursus ii., in his 2nd ed. (omit his 3rd);—also Tholuck and Olshausen loc. To attempt to recount the various opinions, would exceed the limits of an edition of the whole Testament the present subject is one in which manifold dogmatical variations of vital belief have influenced Commentators to such an extent as to render accurate classification impossible. I roughly state, that three leading ones may be traced: that of those who (a) that no reference to the Holy Eucharist is intended,—among whom Origen and Basil, of the ancients; and the moderns, the Swiss Reformers, Z and Calvin (the former however no decidedly, see Olsh. ii. 173 note), Luther, Melancthon. (β) That the whole passage regards exclusively the Holy Communion,—among whom are Chrysostom, Cyril, Theophylact, Euthymius, the Schoolmen, and the Roman Catholic expositors, with a few exceptions. (γ) That the subject and idea of the Holy Communion, not the ordinance is referred to: to which class belong the best modern Commentators in Germany, e. g. Lücke, Tholuck, Olshausen, Stier. Bengel's note to the same effect is important: 'Jesus verba sua scienter ita formavit, ut statim et semper illa quidem de spirituali frutione sui agerent proprie; sed posthac eadem consequenter etiam in augustissimum S. Cœnæ mysterium, quum id institutum foret, convenirent. Etenim ipsam rem hoc sermone propositam in S. Cœnam contulit; tantique hoc sacramentum esset momenti, ut facile existimari possit, Jesum, ut proditorem Judæ ver. 71, et mortem suam hoc versu, ita etiam S. Cœnam, de qua inter hæc verba certissime secum cogitavit, uno ante anno prædixisse, ut discipuli possent prædictionis postea recordari. Tota hæc de carne et sanguine J. C. oratio Passionem spectat, et cum ea S. Cœnam. Hinc separata carnis et sanguinis mentio constanter. Nam in passione sanguis ex corpore eductus est, Agnusque mactatus.' ^{52.}]

The inference conveyed in φαγεῖν, which first comes from the Jews themselves, is yet a right one. If He is the Bread, and that Bread is His Flesh, we must eat His Flesh, though not in the sense here meant by them. They contended against one another, probably some having more insight into the possibility of a spiritual meaning than others. ^{53.}]

Our Lord not only ratifies their φαγεῖν, but adds to it a more wonderful thing; that they must also do that against which a prohibition might seem to have existed from Noah downwards,—drink His Blood. But observe, this Blood is not to be eaten in the Flesh, which was the forbidden thing (Gen. ix. 4: Levit. xvii. 10—16), in its strict literal form: but to be drunk, separate from the flesh: again presupposing death. Now as the Flesh of Christ (see above) is the Resurrection-Body which He now has, and in which all things consist; so is His Blood ("the blood is the life," Lev. xvii. 11, 14) the Life which He gave up, paid down, as the penalty for the sin of the world. By the shedding, pouring forth, of that Blood, is remission of sin.

It is quite impossible that these words should, as De Wette maintains, be merely an expansion of τὴν σάρκα φαγεῖν. Even had the idea of τὸ αἷμα πίνειν been one familiar to the Jews, the construction would not have allowed such an interpretation;—but new as it was, and abhorrent from their habits and law, we must regard it as specially and purposely added.

But what is this eating and drinking? Clearly, not merely faith: for faith answers to the hand reached forth for the food,—but is not the act of eating. Faith is a necessary condition of the act: so that we can hardly say with Augustine, 'crede, et manducasti;' but 'crede et manducabis.' Inasmuch as Faith will necessarily in its energizing lead to this partaking, we sometimes incorrectly say that it is Faith:—but for strict accuracy this is not enough. To eat the flesh of Christ, is to realize, in our inward life, the mystery of His Body now in heaven,—to digest and assimilate our own portion in that Body.

To drink His Blood, is to realize, in our inward life, the mystery of His satisfaction for sin,—to digest and assimilate our own portion in that satisfaction, the outpouring of that Blood. And both these definitions may be gathered into one, which is: The eating of His Flesh and drinking of His Blood import the making to ourselves and using as objectively real, those two great Truths of our Redemption in Him, of which our Faith subjectively convinces us.

And of this realizing of Faith He has been pleased to appoint certain symbols in the Holy Communion, which He has commanded to be received; to signify to us the spiritual process, and to assist us towards 60—65.] Murmuring of some of the disciples at the foregoing discourse, and the answer of Jesus to them.

60.] Lampe shews by reff. and other citations that σκληρὸς ‘non tam absurditatem quam impietatem designat.’ It seems clear that it was not the difficulty, so much as the strangeness of the saying, which scandalized them. It is the whole discourse,—the turn given to it,—the doctrine of the Bread of Life,—the giving His Flesh and Blood to eat,—at which they take offence. ἀκούειν, to listen to it.—‘Who can stay and hear such sayings as this?’ not, ‘to understand it.’

61.] ἐν ἑαυτῷ, by His divine knowledge. 62.] δὲν οὖν θ., what then, if ye see . . . not meaning ‘will ye not then be much more scandalized?’ or, ‘what will ye say (or do), then?’—but appealing to an event which they should witness, as a certain proof of one part of the σκληρὸς λόγος, with which indeed the rest of it was bound up.—His having descended from heaven. All attempts (as those of Lücke, De Wette, and others) to explain this otherwise than of His ascent into heaven, are simply dishonest,—and spring from laxity of belief in the historical reality of that event. That it is not recorded by John, is of no moment here: see Prolegomena. And that none but the Twelve saw it, is unimportant; for how do we know that our Lord was not here speaking to some among the Twelve? To explain it of His death, as part of His going up where He was before, is hardly less disingenuous. Lücke maintains that θεωρεῖν need not mean bodily sight: which is true enough in some constructions in John (ch. viii. 51 al.); but surely, as joined with ἀναβαίνοντα, it must. The whole exegesis of the passage in the above-named Commentators is a remarkable instance of the warping of the judgment by unsoundness of belief in the historical truth of the Evangelistic testimony. 63.] πνεῦμα, σὰρξ, do not mean the spiritual and carnal sense of the foregoing discourse, as many Commentators explain them: for our Lord is speaking, not of teaching merely, but of vivifying: He is explaining the life-giving principle of which He had been before speaking. ‘Such eating of My flesh as you imagine and find hard to listen to, could profit you nothing,—for it will have ascended up, &c.; and besides, generally, it is only the Spirit that can vivify the spirit of man; the flesh (in whatever way used) can profit nothing towards this.’

 this, as the Swiss anti-sacramentalists do, is to make Him contradict His own words

τὰ ῥήμα. & ἐγὼ λελάληκα] viz. the words μου τὴν σάρκα and μου τὸ αἷμα, above. They are πνεῦμα and ζωή:
 —spirit, not flesh only:—living food, not carnal and perishable. This meaning has been missed by almost all Commentators: Stier upholds it, iv. 281 (2nd^{edn.}): and it seems to me beyond question the right one.
 The common interpretation is, 'the words which I have spoken,' i. e. 'My discourses,' are πνεῦμα, 'to be taken in a spiritual sense,' (? this sense of πνεῦμα,) 'and are life.' But this is any thing but precise, even after the forcing of πνεῦμα.

 Wette remarks, that the foreknowledge of our Lord with regard to Judas renders it impossible to apply the ordinary rules of moral treatment, as 'Why did He then knowing him to be a thief? &c.,'—to the

to bind them closer to Himself. We must not forget likewise, in the mystery of our Lord's human nature, that at such a moment of desertion, He would seek comfort in the faith and attachment of His chosen ones.

⁶⁹.] Peter answers quickly and earnestly for the rest, as in Matt. xvi. 16. πρὸς τίνα.] What they had heard and seen had awakened in them the desire of being led on by some teacher towards eternal life; and to whom else should they go from Him who had, and brought out of His stores for their instruction, the words (see ver. 63) of eternal life?

⁶⁹.] πεπιστεύκαμεν seems to be used absolutely, as in ver. 64: we believe, and have long done so.

In the following words the readings vary; the common text having been to all appearance introduced from Matt. xvi. 16. The circumstance of the Lord not being elsewhere called ὁ ἅγιος τ. θεοῦ by John, is of course in favour of the reading. The idea however is found (ch. x. 36). I regard the coincidence with the testimony of the damoniacs, reff. Mark ||, as a remarkable one. Their words appear to have been the first plain declaration of the fact, and so to have laid hold on the attention of the Apostles.

⁷⁰.] The selection of the Twelve by Jesus is the consequence of the giving of them to Him by the Father, ch. xvii. 6,—in which there also Judas is included. So that His selecting, and the Father's giving and drawing, do not exclude final falling away.

Meyer observes, that the solemn addition, τοὺς δώδεκα after ὑμᾶς, heightens the contrast to the opposite result which follows.

διάβολος.] It is doubtful in what sense this word should be taken. Whether we render it διαβολικός (= τοῦ διαβόλου ὑπουργός), or ἱπιδουλος, (both given by Euthym.,) it will be an ἀπαξ λεγόμενον in the N. T. Of the two however the latter is the harsher, and less analogous to N. T. diction. Certainly, in the dark act here prophesied, Judas was under the immediate instigation of and yielded himself up to Satan (cf. our Lord's reply to Peter, Matt. xvi. 23); and I would understand this expression as having reference to that league with and entertainment of the Evil One in his thoughts and purposes, which his ultimate possession by Satan implies. This meaning can perhaps hardly be rendered by any single word in another language. The E. V. 'a devil,' is certainly too strong; devilish, would be better, but not unobjectionable. Compare ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας ch. xvii. 12.

⁷¹.] On the name Ἰσκαριώτης (here applied to Simon, Judas's father), see on Matt. x. 4. ἐμελλεν, not, 'intended,'

CHAP. VII.—X.] JESUS THE LIGHT OF
 THE WORLD. The conflict at its height.

VII. 1—52.] JESUS MEETS THE UNBELIEF OF THE JEWS AT JERUSALEM.
The circumstances [vv. 1—13].

1.] The chronology of this period is very doubtful.
 I have remarked on it in my note on Luke
 ix. 51. Thus much we may observe here, that μετὰ ταῦτα cannot apply emphatically to ch. vi., but must be referred back to ch.
 v., as indeed must the Jews seeking to kill Him, and the miracle alluded to in ver. 23. But it will not follow from this,
 that ch. vi. is not in its right place: it contains an independent memoir of a miracle and discourse of our Lord in Galilee which actually happened in the interval, and only serves to shew us the character of this Gospel as made up of such memoirs, more or less connected with one another, and selected by the Evangelist for their higher spiritual import, and the discourses arising from them. I would understand this verse as merely carrying on the time from ch. v.
 and ch. vi.,—and its contents as introductory to the account of Jesus not going up at first to the feast. Ch. vi. is in some measure presupposed in our ver. 3, as indicating that He had not constantly observed the festal journeys of late.

2.] See Deut. xvi. 13—17. Josephus, Antt. viii. 4. 1, calls this ἑορτὴ ἀγῶνῶν και μεγιστη. It began on the 15th (ing of 14th) of Tisri, and lasted evening of the 22nd.

in the highest sense. This verse also excludes all of His brethren: it is inconceivable that John should have so written, if any among them believed at that time. The attempt to make the words mean, that some of his brethren did not believe on him, is in my view quite futile. In that case we should certainly have had some such expression as ἦσαν γὰρ καὶ ἐκ τῶν ἀδελφῶν αὐτοῦ, οἱ οὐκ ἐπίστευον εἰς αὐτόν. No such attempt would ever have been made by a Greek scholar,—except for the fiction which has been so long, and, strange to say, is still upheld with regard to our Lord's brethren. The emphatic expression, οὐδὲ γὰρ οἱ ἀδ., is a strong corroboration of the view that they were really and literally brethren;—see also Pa. lxi. 8.

6—9.] δ καιρ. δ εμ. can hardly be taken as directly meaning 'the time of my sufferings and death,'—but as ἡ ὥρα μου in ch. ii. 4: 'My time for the matter of which you speak, viz. manifestation to the world.' That (ch. xii. 32) was to take place in a very different manner. But they, having no definite end before them, no glory of God to shew forth, but being of the world, always had their opportunity ready of mingling with and standing well with the world. Then (ver. 7), 'you have no hatred of the world in your way: but its hatred to Me on account of my testimony against it, causes me to exercise this caution which you so blame.' In ver. 8, it is of little import (see var. readd.) whether we read οὐκ or οὐπω: the sense will be the same, both on account of the present, ἀναβῆναι (not ἀναβήσομαι), which would express the disavowal of an intention to go up), and of οὐπω afterwards. οὐκ ἀναβ. would mean, I am not (at present) going up. Meyer attributes to our Lord change of purpose, and justifies his view by the example of His treatment of the Syrophenician woman, whom He at first repulsed, but afterwards had compassion on. Matt. xv. 26 ff. The same Commentator directs attention to the emphatic ταύτην, as implying that our Lord had it in His mind to go up to some future feasts, but not to this one. οὐπω πεπλήρ. is not yet fully come; see Luke

Whether the Twelve were with Him, we have no means of judging: probably so, for they appear ch. ix. 2; and after their becoming once attached to the Person of our Lord as Apostles, we find no trace of His having been for any long time separated from them, except during their mission Matt. x., which was long ago accomplished.

^{11.} These Ἰουδ. are, as usual, the ἀρχοντες, as distinguished from the multitudes. Their question itself (ἐκείνος) shews a hostile spirit.

^{12.} οἱ ὄχλ. (the different groups of which ὁ ὄχλος was composed) would include the Galilaean disciples, and those who had been baptized by the disciples in Judaea,—whose view ἀγαθός ἐστιν would represent,—as expressed mildly in protest against His enemies.

Such indications are not their value in these times. ¹¹ only does our Lord call His διδασκῆ, as being now among the καλοὶ, the Rabbis, in the temple often so called by the Evangelists.

The words may bear two meanings—either, 'the sense of Scripture teaching is not my own, but that in was originally penned as a revelation

God; or, My teaching (generally) is not mine, but that of Him who sent me. The latter is preferable, as agreeing better with what follows, and because the former assumes that He was expounding Scripture, which, though probable, is not asserted.

17.] Θελεῖν τὸ θ. αὐτ. ποιεῖν is equivalent to τὴν ἀγάπην τοῦ θεοῦ ἔχειν ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, ch. v. 42. The θελεῖν should not have been slurred over in the E. V., for it is important. If any man's will be, to do His will, &c. As it now stands in the E. V., a wrong idea is conveyed: that the bare performance of God's outward commands will give a man sufficient acquaintance with Christian doctrine:—whereas what our Lord asserts to the Jews is, that if the will be set in His ways, if a man be really anxious to do the will of God, and thus to fulfil this first great commandment of the law,—be, as Meyer expresses it, in ethical harmony with God,—the singleness of purpose, and subjection to the will of God, will lead him on to faith in the promised and then apparent Messiah, and to a just discrimination of the divine character of his teaching.

18.] This gives us the reason why he, who wishes to do God's will, will know of the teaching of Christ: viz. because both are seeking one aim—the glory of God:—and the humility of him, whose will it is to do God's will, can best appreciate that more perfect humility of the divine Son, who speaks not of himself, but of Him that sent him,—see ch. v. 41—44, of which this verse is a repetition with a somewhat different bearing. In its general sense, it asserts that self-exaltation and self-seeking necessarily accompany the unaided teaching of man, but that all true teaching is from God. But then we must remember that, simply taken, the latter part of the sentence is only true of the Holy One Himself; that owing to human infirmity, purity of motive is no sure guarantee for correctness of doctrine;—and therefore in this second part it is not τοῦ θεοῦ, which would generalize it to all men, but τοῦ πέμψ. αὐτόν, which confines it to Himself.

19.] There is a close connexion with the foregoing. Our Lord now takes the offensive against them. The θέλειν τὸ θέλημα αὐτοῦ ποιεῖν was to be the great key to a true appreciation of His teaching: but of this there was no example among them: and therefore it was that they were no fair judges of the teaching, but bitter opponents and persecutors of Jesus, of whom, had they been anxious to fulfil the law, they would have been earnest and humble disciples (ch. v. 46). The law was to be read before all Israel every seventh year in the feast of tabernacles (Deut. xxxi. 10—13):—whether this was such a year is uncertain: but this verse may allude to the practice, even if it was not.

ζητεῖτε ἀποκτ.] In their killing the Lord of Life was summed up all their transgression of God's law. It was the greatest proof of their total ignorance of and disobedience to it.

20.] The multitude, not the rulers, replied this. Indeed their question, τίς σε ζητεῖ ἀποκτεῖναι; shews their ignorance of the purpose of their rulers, which our Lord had just exposed and charged them with. It would not now be their policy to represent Him as possessed.

healing in ch. v. 22.] διὰ τοῦτο is variously placed; either at the end of ver. 21, so as to come after θαυμάζετε, (Cod. X, lat.-g, Theophyl., Beza, and many of the moderns, Lücke, De Wette, Stier, Lechmann, &c.)—or at the beginning of this verse (Codd. D, E, G, K, L, T, U, Δ, A, vulg., the syriac versions, coptt., goth., Euthym., Chrys., Cyril, Grotius, &c.). I prefer the latter arrangement: because (1) I believe τοῦτο would not be used in the sense required by the other, but αὐτό [nor can I see that the ἐν ἔργον makes the τοῦτο any more applicable (see Stier, edn. 2, iv. 315); nay, it seems to me to take the attention off from the particular work done, and fix it on the mere ἐν ἔργ. ποιήσαι, abstractedly.—Ye wonder that I have acted at all; and (2) because I find διὰ τοῦτο joined with ὅτι to be a usual mode of speaking with our Evangelist, see ch. v. 16, 18; viii. 47 (θαυμάζειν διὰ τοῦτο is used Mark vi. 6; Rev. xvii. 7, see also John iii. 29). (3) I see an appropriateness of meaning in ver. 22 with the διὰ τοῦτο, which it has not without it. Moses on this account gave you circumcision, not because it is of Moses, but of the fathers; [the repetition of ἐκ τ. Μωυ. ισρ., does not necessarily imply a parenthesis: John constantly uses these formal repetitions: this in answer to Stier, iv. 315, edn. 2]—i. e. it is no part of the law of Moses, properly so called,—but was adopted by Moses, and thereby becomes part of his law. The meaning of οὐχ ὅτι, “not that,” implying “I mean not, that,” does not seem to suit the context so well, because it would leave the preceding διὰ τοῦτο without any thing to refer to. Now you circumcise on the Sabbath, to avoid breaking the law of Moses, &c. If our Lord had said these last words (in ver. 23) merely, the argument would not have been strict might have answered, that circumcision was not only a command of the anterior to it; whereas ver. 22 takes answer from them; reminding them though they regarded its sanction rived from Moses, it was in fact and tacitly approving their doing it Sabbath. Then the argument is, may be done on the Sabbath:—in dinance strictly Mosaic (which is bath in its Jewish mode of observance may be set aside by another, Moses but more ancient, and borrowed more general and direct command (‘circumcisio est antiquior rigido c bati per Moesen imperato’—Grotius much more may it by a deed of a benevolent exercise of divine power approval of which is anterior deeper than all ceremonial enact

23.] ἵνα μὴ λυθῇ—not, —non solvatur;—‘salva lege;’—ungrammatical;—but in order to Law of Moses may not be broken that which (after the fathers) ordains circumcision on the eighth day. εἰθρ.] The distinction is between circumcision, which purified only part of by which he received (ἐλαβεν) ceremonial cleanness,—and that perfect and healing which the Lord bestowed on the cripple. Stier (after Bengel) thinks ὅλον refers to body and soul,—see 14,—whose healing is a much benefit than circumcision, even viewed as a sacrament: ‘nam circumcisio est sanitatio animæ finis.’ But this is too subtle. The Jews could not appreciate this meaning, and the argument is especially addressed to them. Besides, it is by no means certain that passage that such was the case affirmatively. I incline to the latter view, for this reason:—obviously no very high degree of knowledge whence He was is implied, for they knew not Him that sent Him (see also ch. viii. 14, 19), and therefore could not know whence He was, in this sense. The answer is made in their own sense:—they knew that He was from Nazareth in Galilee, see ver. 41,—and probably that He was called the son of Joseph. In this sense they knew whence He was; but further than this they knew not.

καὶ αὐτὸν ἐμὴν . . . and moreover—and besides this—not = but. The sense of ἀληθινός must be gathered from the context. I have not come of Myself, but He who sent Me is ἀληθινός—ye know Him not, but I know Him,—for I came from Him, and He sent Me. The matter here impressed on them is the genuineness, the reality of the fact:—that Jesus was sent, and there was one who sent Him, though they knew Him not, and consequently knew not πόθεν ἐστίν. The nearest English word would be real: but this would not convey the meaning perspicuously to the ordinary mind;—perhaps the E. V. true is better, provided it be explained to mean objectively, not subjectively, true: really existing, not ‘truthful,’ which it may be questioned whether the word ἀληθινός will bear, although it is so maintained by Euthym., Cyril, Chrys., Theo-phylact, Lampe, Baumgarten-Crusius, Tholuck, and many others. See on this, ch. viii. 16 and note. With the 34 of the rec. omitted the sense becomes more emphatic. It was probably inserted on account of the apparent want of connexion, as has been the case very frequently throughout the Gospel. We have here an instance of a usage of ἐκεῖνος which is very common in St. John, as emphasizing the main subject, not (as more commonly) diverting the attention to one more removed. In ignorance of this usage, Hilgenfeld, "Die Evangelia nach ihrer Entstehung, u. s. w.," has argued from ch. xix. 35, that the writer of this Gospel cannot himself have been an eye-witness of the crucifixion, because he there distinguishes that witness by ἐκεῖνος from himself. In consequence of this assertion, an article has appeared in the Stud. u. Kritik for 1859, pt. 3, by G. E. Steiss, in which the use of ἐκεῖνος by St. John is gone into, and Hilgenfeld's mistake (which Köstlin had committed before him) is exposed. Referring to that article for the full treatment of the subject, I merely cite from among many other instances of the usage, ch. i. 18, 33; v. 11; vi. 57; x. xii. 48; xiv. 12, 21, 26; xvii. 24.

30.] Namely, the rulers,—instigated by what had been above remarked by the people, vv. 25, 26. There was some secondary hindrance to their laying hands on Him,—possibly the fear of the people: but the Evangelist passes at once to the real cause;—that God's appointed time was not yet come.

31.] The 34 here contrasts with what went before—many, many &c. The indefiniteness of ἐταν (34) implies their belief that the Christ had come.

32–36.] HE WILL RETURN TO THE FATHER.

32.] The wavering of the multitude appears to the Pharisees a dangerous sign: and the Sanhedrim (of 40.) send officers specially to lay hold on Him.

33, 34.] The omission or insertion of αὐτοῖς makes very little difference. The words were spoken, not to the officers only, but to all the people. ἐτι x.

...] This appears to be said in reference to ver. 30, to shew them the uselessness of their attempting to lay hands on Him till His hour was come, which it soon would do.

πρὸς τ. π. με.] It has been asked, 'If Jesus thus specified where He was going, how could the Jews ask the question in ver. 35?' but De Wette answers well, that the Jews knew not τὸν πέμψαντα αὐτόν, and therefore the saying was a dark one to them.

[ζητ. μ., κ. οὐχ εὐρ.] These words must not be pressed too much, as has been done by many interpreters (Chrysost., Theophyl., Euthym., Meyer, Tholuck, but not in his 6th ed.), who would make them mean 'Ye shall seek My help and not find it' (viz. in your need, at the destruction of Jerusalem); for this would not be true even of the Jews, any one of whom might have at any time turned and looked on Him whom he had pierced, by faith,—and have been saved;—nor again must it be taken as meaning, 'Ye shall seek to lay hands on Me, and shall not be able' (Orig., Grot.),—which is rapid and unmeaning. Neither of these interpretations, nor their cognates, will agree with the parallel place, ch. xiii. 33, where the same words are used to the disciples. The meaning is simply (as in reff.), 'My bodily presence will be withdrawn from you; I shall be personally in a place inaccessible to you:' see ch. xiii. 36.

εἰμι, am; not εἶμι, 'go,' which is never used in the N. T. Nor need we supply τότε; the present tense is used in the solemn sense of ch. i. 18, and ch. iii. 13, to signify essential truth. Compare οὐ δύνασθε addressed to the Jews, with οὐ δύνασαι μοι νῦν ἀκολ., ἀκολουθήσεις δὲ ὑστερον to Peter, ch. xiii. 36, and it will be evident that the Lord had their spiritual state in view: 'Ye cannot, as ye are now, enter there.'

On the whole, see Luke xvii. 22. ³⁵, ³⁶.] The Jews understood not his death to be meant, but some journey which he would take in the event of their rejecting him.

The διασπ. τ. Ἑλλ. must not be interpreted 'the Hellenistic Jews,' for the Ἕλληνες are always distinguished from the Jews; and this would convey hardly any meaning. The sense of διασπορά is,—see reff. James, 1 Pet.,—'the country where Jews lay scattered,' as qualified by the succeeding genitive, where one occurs, as here. So here ἡ δ. τ. Ἑλ. means 'the dispersed in the Gentile world';—and their intent is, to convey contempt and mockery. They do not however believe the hypothesis; but ask again, τίς ἐστὶν ὁ λόγος οὗτος; of the feast, the eighth day is reckoned in, as usual. Josephus, Antt. iii. 10. 4, gives a similar account. In 2 Macc. x. 6, we read ἡμέρας ὀκτώ, σκηνομάτων τρόπον. But the eighth day was not properly one of the feast-days; the people ceased to dwell in the tabernacles on the seventh day. Philo says of it, ἐπεὶ δὲ ἡμέραις ὀγδόῃν ἐπισφραγίζεται, καλίσας ἐξ ὁδίου αὐτῆν, οὐκ ἐκίνησεν ὡς τοικε μόνον τῆς ἰορήης, ἀλλὰ πασῶν τῶν ἰησιῶν ὅσας καθ-ηριθμήσμεν τλιευαία γὰρ ἰστί τοῦ ἰν-αυτοῦ. De Septenario, § 24. And though this, as Lücke observes (ii. 224), may be pure conjecture, it is valuable, as shewing the fact the reason of which is conjectured; viz. that the eighth day was held in more than ordinary estimation. The eighth day then seems here to be meant, and the last of the feast to be popularly used, as in some of the citations above. But a difficulty attends this view. Our Lord certainly seems to allude here to the custom which prevailed during the seven days of the feast, of a priest bringing water in a golden vessel from the pool of Siloam with a jubilant procession to the temple, standing on the altar and pouring it out there, together with wine, while meantime the Hallel (Ps. cxlii.—cxviii.) was sung. This practice was by some supposed—as the dwelling in tabernacles represented their life in the desert of old—to refer to the striking of the rock by Moses:—by others, to the rain, for which they then prayed, for the seed of the ensuing year:—by the elder Rabbis (Maimonides, cited by Stier, iv. 331, edn. 2), to Isa. xii. 3, and the effusion of the Holy Spirit in the days of the Messiah. But it was universally agreed (with the single exception of the testimony of R. Juda Hakkadosh, quoted in the tract Succa, which itself distinctly asserts the contrary), that on the eighth day this ceremony did not take place. Now, out of this difficulty I would extract what I believe to be the right interpretation. It was the eighth day, and the pouring of water did not take place. But is therefore (as Lücke will have it) all allusion to the ceremony excluded? I think not: nay, I believe it is the more natural. For seven days the ceremony had been performed, and the Hallel sung. On the eighth day the Hallel was sung, outpouring of the water did not take place. 'desideraverunt aliquid.' 'The stood and cried, &c.' Was not most natural time? Was it not that He would have said it at time, rather even than while the c itself was going on? An has been made to alter the pun thus: ἰάν τις διψῇ, ἐρχέσθω πρὸ πινέτω ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἐμὶ καθ-ἡ γρ., ποταμοὶ κ.τ.λ. Of this I say, that it is surprising to me one accustomed to the style of o gelist can for a moment suppose ble. The harshness of καὶ πινέ-εἰς ἐμὶ is beyond all example. T nary punctuation, making ὁ πιν- nom. abs., see ch. vi. 39, is the missible one,—even were it beset greater difficulties than it is. [T tuation above mentioned is stro held against this note in Stier, In spite of what he there says, think it can ever make way among scholars. It introduces two suby the first part of the sentence, viz. and ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἐμὶ, to the u fusion of both sense and metaph distinction, insisted on by Stier, the believer on Christ, who was to come, but to drink,—and the t the feast, who only witnessed pouring of the water,—and which as a reason why πινέτω must st phatically before ὁ πινσ. its qualify ject, will be quite as marked with t punctuation: nay even more so.] the first clauses, see notes on ch 14. καθὼς εἶπ. ἡ γρ.] The must apply to ποταμοὶ ἐκ κ. . . ὁ πινσ. εἰς ἐμὶ could not form par citation. of the temple. Again in Zech. xiv. 8, ἐξελίσσεται ὕδωρ ζῶν ἐξ Ἱερουσαλὴμ. I believe these expressions to be all to which the citation applies, and the ἐκ τῆς κοιτίας αὐτοῦ to be the interpretation of the corresponding words in the prophecies. For the temple was symbolic (see ch. ii. 21) of the Body of the Lord; and the Spirit which dwells in and flows forth from His glorified Body, dwells in and flows forth from His people also, who are made like unto Him, Gal. iv. 6; Rom. viii. 9—11; 1 Cor. iii. 16.

^{39.} The difficulties raised concerning this interpretation of the saying of our Lord have arisen from a misapprehension. John does not say that the words were a prophecy of what happened on the day of Pentecost; but of the Spirit, which the believers were about to receive. Their first reception of Him must not be illogically put in the place of all His indwelling and working, which are here intended. And the symbolism of the N. T. is fully satisfied by the interpretation. Granted that the water is the water of life—what is that life but the life of the Spirit? τὸ φρόνημα τοῦ πνεύματος, [ζωή, Rom. viii. 6; and again, τὸ πνεῦμα, [ζωή, ib. ver. 10. It is lamentable to see such able and generally right-minded Commentators as Lücke carping at the interpretation of an Apostle, and the one Apostle who perhaps of all men living had the deepest insight into the wonderful analogies of spiritual things.

οὐπω ἦν] The additions διδομενον, δοθιν, ἐπ' αὐτοῖς, are all glosses, to avoid a misunderstanding which no intelligent reader could fall into. Chr. in loc. quotes the verse thus: ὁ εὐαγγελιστὴς ἔλεγεν, Οὐπω γὰρ ἦν πνεῦμα ἅγιον, τούτῳσι δοθιν, ἐπεὶ Ἰησοῦς οὐπω ἔδοξάσθη δόξαν καλὴν τὸν σταυρόν. It is obvious that ἦν cannot refer to the essential existence of the Holy Spirit, as this would be not only in flat contradiction to ch. i. 32, 33; iii. 5, 8, 34, but to the whole O. T., in which the agency of the Spirit in the outward world is recognized even more vividly than in the N. T. The ἦν implies not exactly διδομενον, but rather ἐνεργεῖν, or some similar word: was not,—had not come in; 'the dispensation of the Spirit was not yet.' ἔδοξάσθη, through death. The glorified Body of the Lord is the temple from under whose threshold the Holy Spirit flows forth to us; see ch. i. 16; Rom. viii. 11; Col. ii. 9.

^{40.} ὁ προφήτης is here clearly distinguished from ὁ χριστός: see note on ch. i. 21, and Deut. xviii. 15.

^{41—43.} The mention of the question about Bethlehem seems to me rather to corroborate our belief that the Evangelist was well aware how the fact stood, than (De Wette) to imply that he was ignorant of it. That no more remarks are appended, is natural. John had one great design in writing his gospel, and does not allow it to be interfered with by explanations of matters otherwise known. Besides, we may note that De Wette's "probability, that John knew nothing of the birth at Bethlehem," reaches much further than may appear at first. If John knew nothing of it, and yet the mother of the Lord lived with him, the inference must be that she knew nothing of it,—in other words, that it never happened. σχίσμα implies a violent dissension,—some taking up His cause, some wishing to lay hands on Him. 44.] These were from among the multitude. [53—CHAP. VIII. 11.] THE HISTORY OF THE WOMAN TAKEN IN ADULTERY.—See var. readd.; and a very complete discussion of the authorities for and against the passage in Lücke (third edition), ii. 243—256. The critical examination of the genuineness of this passage is attended with many and complicated difficulties. Setting aside here purely diplomatic evidence (for which see var. readd.), we may observe (1) that at first sight, the reasons given by Aug. and Nicen seem enough to warrant the inference that it was expunged on account of the supposed licence given by it to sin. And this has been the hypothesis generally adopted by those who would override critical difficulties by strong autocratic assertion. Even Stier and Ebrard decide thus, without pausing to examine the real complications of the question. But (2) granting that such an hypothesis might be admissible as regards ch. viii. 3—11, I do not see how the whole passage can be involved in it, especially the opening verse 53, which would naturally appear to form a sequel to what has preceded, and would surely never have been expunged with the offensive paragraph. (3) No such hypothesis as this will account for the co-existence of so many distinct and independent texts, apparently none of which owes its origin to any attempt to remove matter of offence. This phenomenon (not that of the abundance of various readings, from which it is totally distinct) points undoubtedly to some inherent defect in

we read it. [It would be hardly worth while to cite an opinion which affirms that 'such a course of argument is very fallacious, leads to nothing but endless logomachies, and can never settle a question of this kind' (Bloomf. ed. 9),—were it not earnestly to remind my readers, that the more the sacred text is really studied, the more such considerations, duly and cautiously weighed, will be urged and appreciated.] (8) Balancing all these difficulties, I am almost disposed, as a desperate resource, to adopt the following hypothesis; not as by any means satisfying or even recommending itself to me, but as really the only one which seems at all to shew us a way out of the enigma: That the Evangelist may have, in this solitary case, incorporated a portion of the current oral tradition into his narrative: that this portion may have been afterwards variously corrected, from the gospel of the Hebrews, or other traditional sources: that being seen in early times to be alien from John's diction, it may have been by some replaced in the synoptic narrative, in its apparent chronological place, at Luke xxi. fin.: or inserted variously in this Gospel from the mere fact of having dropped out here. Then again the contents of the passage would operate with the above causes to its exclusion altogether from many MSS.: and the fact of some excluding only ch. viii. 8—11, seems certainly to shew that the moral element did operate in the matter. (9) Dropping all idea of the hypothesis just suggested, our conclusion on the data must I think be, to retain the passage, as we retain Mark xvi. 9 ff., with a distinction from the rest of the text.

With regard to the question, what text of the passage itself to adopt, it would seem idle to attempt to unite into one by critical processes texts which seem to be due to different sources. Our solution of the question must be merely formal and diplomatic. And, thus solving it, it has been thought best in this Edition to give the text as it is found in the only one of our most ancient MSS. which contains it: the amount and nature of the variations being fully seen in the accompanying Digest. In adopting this plan, it will be observed that no judgment whatever is given on the purity of the text thus adopted,—no approval whatever of the Codex Bezae as a fons lectionum: our proceeding is simply a formal and objective one, adopted as a necessity where no other seemed even moderately satisfactory.

53.] The circumstance that this verse is included in the dubious passage is remarkable, and seems to shew, as remarked above, that the doubt has not arisen from any ethical difficulty, as Aug. hints (var. read.),—for then the passage would have begun with ch. viii. 1. Nor can this verse have been expunged to keep up the connexion with ch. viii. 12—for that is just as good with it,—if understood, as usually, of the members of the Sanhedrim. We must now regard it as fragmentary, forming the beginning of the account of the woman taken in adultery. It is therefore not clear to what the words apply. Taken in conjunction with what follows (see on ch. viii. 5), I should say that they indicate some time during the last days of the Lord's ministry, when He spent the nights on the Mount of Olives, as the date of the occurrence. Certainly

But not to dwell on other objections to this view,—e. g. that such an allusion to the woman would be wholly out of character after our Lord's previous treatment of her,—how come these Pharisees, who on the hypothesis of the above Commentators are the same as those who accused the woman, to be again so soon present? Was this at all likely? We cannot escape from this difficulty with Stier, iv. 363, edn. 2, by supposing a multitude of the people to have been witnesses on both occasions: the οἱ Φαρισαῖοι of the one must surely extend through the other, if this connexion is to be maintained. city in which these Scribes and Pharisees acted when they brought the woman. Probably, only as tempting Jesus, and not in the course of any legal proceedings against her. Such would have required (Lev. xx. 10; Deut. xxii. 22) that the man also should have been put to death.

4.] The λέγουσιν αὐτῷ εκπειράζοντες αὐτόν savours much more of the synoptic gospels than of John: see Mt. xvi. 1; xix. 3; xxii. 18, 35; Mk. viii. 11; x. 2; xii. 16, &c. Obviously our ch. vi. 6 is no example to the contrary. (So Luthardt.) The difficulty is even greater than the last, to say, in what sense this was a temptation, to lead to His accusation. The principal solutions of it have been, (1) that the command of the law had fallen into disuse from the frequency of the crime, and to re-assert it would be contrary to the known mildness of Jesus (Michaelis [first part], Aug., Euthym.). But what reason had any of His sayings,—who came to fulfil the Law, not to destroy it,—given them to expect such mildness in this case? And suppose He had re-asserted the law,—how could they have accused Him? (2) That some political snare was hereby laid for Him, whereby the Roman power might have been brought to bear against Him (Grotius and others). But this does not in any way appear; for (α) the Romans certainly allowed to the Jews (by connivance) the power of putting to death according to their law,—as they did in the case of Stephen: (β) our Lord's answer need not have been so worded as to trench upon this matter: and (γ) the accusers would have been more deeply involved than Himself, if such had been the case, being by the law the prominent persons in the execution. So that I leave the difficulty unsolved. Lücke (whose discussion on it see, ii. 261 ff.) observes: 'Since Jesus seems to avoid every kind of decision on the question put to Him, it follows that He found in it no reference to the great subjects of His teaching, but treated it as a purely civil or political matter, with which in His ministry He had no concern. Some kind of civil or political collision the question certainly was calculated to provoke: but from the brevity of the narration, and our want of more accurate knowledge of criminal proceedings at the time, it is impossible to 5.] I will just remark that the very fact of their questioning thus, 'Moses commanded, . . . but what sayest Thou?' belongs to the last days of the Lord's ministry, and cannot well be introduced chronologically where it here stands: nor does John any where introduce these questions between the law of Moses and Jesus; but the synoptic gospels often do. The command here mentioned is not to be found, unless 'putting to death' generally, is to be interpreted as = stoning;—compare Exod. xxxi. 14; xxxv. 2, with Num. xv. 35, 36, in which the special order given by God would sanction such a view. But the Rabbis taught 'omne mortis supplicium in scriptura absolute positum esse strangulationem.' Tract Sanhedr. ch. x. (Lücke, De Wette.) The passage Ezek. xvi. 38, 40 proves nothing, or proves too much; for it is added, 'and thrust thee through with their swords.'

I would rather suppose that from Deut. xxii. 21, 23, 24, an inference was drawn what kind of a death was intended in ver. 22, the crime being regarded as the same; "he hath humbled his neighbour's wife." We have similar indefiniteness in ib. ver. 25, where evidently the same punishment is meant: see the whole matter discussed in Lücke, ii. 257 ff. 6.

The habit was one to signify pre-occupation of intentional inattention;—see inst Wetstein and Lücke. The one cited from Eilian is irrelevant: see ii. 269 note. The additions πρῶτος or μὴ πρὸς π. are glosses. does not follow that any thing is actually written. Stier refers to J 13, but perhaps without reason. This minute circumstance speaks for the authenticity of the text.

7.] ἀναμάρτ. is common classics: see instances in Lücke not here used in the general sense out sin (E. V.), nor in the sense 'free from the crime of adultery':—but—as ἀμαρτωλός vii. 37,—of the sin of unchastity. rally. Stier, who contends for the genuineness of this narrative place, finds in ver. 46 an allusion saying. I cannot say that his attempt to establish a connexion with the sul discourse is to me at all satisfactory: I am much more inclined to think with Luthardt (i. 16), that the whole arrangement and plan of our Gospel is broken by the insertion of this passage. The Lord Jesus was not sent to be a ruler and a judge in this or that particular case of crime, see Luke xii. 14; but the Ruler and Judge of all: and His answer expresses this, by convicting them all of sin before Him. τον (see digest), if genuine, refers to the first stone, which by Deut. xvii. 7 the witnesses were to cast. 8.] ἵνα μή, βλίσποντος εἰς αὐτοῦς, αἰσχύ- νωνται, ῥᾶν οὕτως ἡλεγχθίντες, καὶ ἵνα, ὡς αὐτοῦ δὴθεν ἀσχαλομένου εἰς τὸ γράφειν, ἰκῇ αὐτοῖς ὑπαναχωρήσαι πρὸ φανερωτέρας καταγνώσεως· καὶ αὐτῶν γὰρ ἰφειδίτο δι' ὑπερβολὴν χρηστότητος.

Euthym. The gloss in U (see var. read.) is curious.

9.] They had said, ταῖς τοιαύταις—they now perceive that they themselves were τοιοῦτοι. There is no historical difficulty in this conduct of the Pharisees, as Olshausen finds;—they were struck by the power of the word of Christ. It was a case somewhat analogous to that in which His ἐγὼ εἰμι struck His foes to the ground, ch. xviii. 6.

The variations of reading are very wide (see digest) in the latter part of the verse. We can hardly (with some) lay any stress on πρεσβυτέρων, as indicating the natural order of conviction of sin. If the consciences of older sinners have heavier loads on them, those of younger ones are more tender. μόνος, i. e. with the multitude and the disciples; the

Then again, he only who knows can witness: and Jesus only knew this.

The question is evidently so worded for the sake of οὐδὲ ἐγὼ σε κατακρίνω: but it expresses the truth in the depth of their hearts. The Lord's challenge to them would lead to a condemnation by comparison with themselves, if they condemned at all: which not done. The words of Jesus fact a far deeper and more solemnity against the sin than could mere penal sentence. not unbelief, for, ver. 24, it is clearly distinguished from that: but, 'your state of sin, unremoved, and therefore abiding and proving your ruin' (see on ver. 24).

The words do not refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, but to individual perdition. In these discourses in John, the public judgment of the Jews is not prominently brought forward, as in the other Evangelists.

ὅπου ἐγὼ ἔρ. is the consequence, not the cause (by any absolute decree) of their dying in their sins (see ch. vii. 34; xiii. 33). This latter sense would have required ὅπου γάρ.

²³.] 'Ye cannot come where I am going, because we both shall return thither whence we came: I to the Father from Whom (ἐκ τῶν ἄνω) I came: ye to the earth and under the earth (for that more a ing surely is not excluded) came' (ἐκ τῶν κάτω).

The ὅπου of course does not only present state of things, but a deeper meaning, of the origin of things (see ver. 44) and its end.

²⁴.] Since this (ver. 23)—if ye do not believe that the Deliverer,—and be renewed ye shall die in your sins (p as struck nearer home to their c and implying individual acts results of the carnal state). O see note, ver. 68.

O reply has been found difficult, from the ambiguity of ὅτι and sense can however be given by will at all harmonize with the notwithstanding Luthardt's def Lücke's interpretation (3rd ed Euthym. 'Why do I speak wi all?' is not only ungrammatical alien from the whole character Lord's discourses. I assume ὅτι is to be read. Then come question: what does ἀλλῶ n has been usually rendered 'say,' 'even the same that I said unto the beginning,' E. V. But as has observed, ἀλλῶ will not bear is never 'to say' simply, but 'to or 'to hold converse,' 'to speak. what is τὴν ἀρχήν? not to be t stantively (as Aug. Ambr. vulg. principium), so as to mean 'The beginning, as I, &c.' (so recently, Dr. Wordsw.) : but adverbially, with all Greek interpreters (see ref.). And adverbially it may mean (1) 'in the beginning,' 'from the beginning,' but not 'firstly.' (2) 'generally,' 'at all,' 'omnino,' usually with a neg. clause, but sometimes with an affirmative. Thus Soph. Antig. 92, ἀρχὴν δὲ θηρῶν οὐ πρότερον γάμψαντα : Herod. i. 9, ἀρχὴν γὰρ ἰγὼ μηχανήσομαι οὕτω : iv. 26, τοῦτο οὐκ ἐνδικομαι τὴν ἀρχὴν : Plato, Lysis, p. 265, πῶς οὖν οἱ ἀγαθοὶ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς ἡμῖν φίλοι ἔσονται τὴν ἀρχὴν ; See many more examples in Hermann on Viger, p. 722. The common rendering takes the first of these meanings ;—but the above remarks on λαλῶ will set that rendering aside ;—and together with the assumption of λαλῶ = λαλεῖν, the meaning, 'in the beginning,' or 'at first,' or 'from the beginning,' falls to the ground. We have then the second meaning of τὴν ἀρχὴν, generally, or 'traced up to its principle,'—for such is the account to be given of this meaning of the word.

The rendering of καὶ, 'even,' and placing it before τὴν ἀρχ., as done in E. V., is ungrammatical. It must be taken with λαλῶ, being inseparable from it by its position between the relative ὅ τι and the verb : as in the clause, ἃς καὶ περιόψει αὐτόν.

This being premised, the sentence must be rendered (literally) thus : Essentially, that which I also discourse unto you : or in very deed, that same which I speak unto you. He is the λόγος—His discourses are the revelation of Himself. And there is especial propriety in this :—When Moses asked the name of God, 'I am that which I AM,' was the mysterious answer ; the hidden essence of the yet unrevealed One could only be expressed by self-comprehension ; but when God manifest in the flesh is asked the same question, it is 'I am that which I SPEAK,' what He reveals Himself to be, that He is (see on next verse). The above sense is maintained by De Wette, and strikingly expanded and illustrated by Stier, iv. 373 ff., edn. 2. The meaning maintained by Meyer, "Do ye ask, what I have been long telling you?" is ingenious, but seems to be by implication refuted by what has been said above. He gives a good résumé of the interpretations.

^{28.} He is, that which He speaks ; and that, He has received from the Father :—He has His definite testimony to give, and His work to do : and therefore, though He has much that He could speak and judge about the Jews, He does it not, but overlooks their malice,—not answering it,—that He may go forward with the λαλεῖν εἰς τὸν κόσμον, the revelation of Himself : the ἀλήθεια of which is all-important, and excludes less weighty things. εἰς τ. κόσμ., out into the world, as εἰς τὸν δόρα λαλοῦντες, 1 Cor. xiv. 9 ; see Mark xiii. 10 ; Luke xxiv. 47. This verse is in the closest connexion with the foregoing.

^{27.} They did not identify ὁ πέμψας με with ὁ πατήρ μου. However improbable this may be after ὁ πέμψας με πατήρ, ver. 18 (De Wette), it is stated as a fact ; and the Evangelist certainly would not have done so without some sure ground :—εἰδὼς αὐτοῦς διαπερθεῖν πρὸς ἀλλήλους λέγοντας Τίς ἐστίν ὁ πέμψας αὐτόν ; Euthym. There is no accounting for the ignorance of unbelief, as any minister of Christ knows by painful experience.

^{28.} This connects (οὖν being the continuation of the foregoing, see above on ver. 21) with ver. 26, and also with ver. 27, as the τότε γνώσεσθε shews, referring to the οὐκ ἔγνωσαν. On ἐγ. see ch. iii. 14. 'When ye shall have been the instruments of accomplishing that death by which He shall enter into His glory : for and to their own dismay and ruin.

The construction and connexion of the following appears to be this : καὶ ἐπ' ἐμωexpansion of ἐγὼ εἰμι : whereas ver. 29 is an independent assertion.

The inter-
change of ποιῶ and λαλῶ is remarkable.
The construction is not elliptical, so that ποιῶ κ. λαλῶ should be understood in both cases ; but the declaration of ver. 25 is still in the Lord's mind, His ποιῶν being all a declaration of the Father,—a λαλεῖν

11; vi. 52), they take the words of our Lord in their outward literal sense. Perhaps this was not always an unintentional misunderstanding.

^{34.]} ποιῶν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν, not = ἀμαρτάνων, for that all do; but = ἐργαζόμενος τὴν ἀνομίαν, Matt. vii. 23. It implies living in the practice of sin,—doing sin, as a habit: see reff. The mere moral sentiment of which this is the spiritual expression, was common among the Greek and Roman philosophers. See Wetstein: also Rom. vi. 12; 2 Pet. ii. 19.

^{35.]} I believe, with Stier and Bengel, the reference to be to Hagar and Ishmael, and Isaac:—the bond and the free. They had spoken of themselves as the seed of Abraham. The Lord shews them that there may be, of that seed, two kinds; the son properly so called, and the slave. The latter does not abide in the house for ever: it is not his right nor his position—'Cast out the bondwoman and her son.' 'But the son abideth ever.' For the application, see on following verses. ὁ δούλος and ὁ υἱός are in this verse generic merely.

^{36.]} Ye then, being in sin, are carnal: the sons of the bondwoman, and therefore need liberation. Now comes in the spiritual reality, into which the discourse passes from the figure. This liberation can only take place by means of Him of whom Isaac was the type—the Seed according to promise; those only who of His Spirit are born again, and after His image, are ὄντως ἐλεύθεροι—truly sons of God, and no longer children of the bondwoman, but of the free. See by all means Gal. iv. 19 (where the subject really begins, not at ver. 21) to end, which is the best commentary on this verse. There is, and can be here, no allusion either to the liberation of the sabbatical year (Ecolampadius); nor to the subject of Heb. iii. 5, 6 (Euthym., after Chrys.).

^{37.]} 'Ye are Abraham's seed, according to the flesh and the covenant: but'—and here the distinction appears—'ye ποιεῖτε τὴν ἁμαρτίαν by seeking to kill Me, because My λόγος (see above on ver. 31) οὐ χωρεῖ—does not work (spread, go forward,—ne marche pas) in you' (not, among you). Herodian, v. 3. 31, says of a report, ὥστε εἰς πᾶν χωρῆσαι τὸ στρατιωτικόν, 'it spread through the whole army.' Such expressions as τὰ πράγματα χωρεῖ κατὰ λόγον, Polyb. xxiii. 15. 12,—ταῦτα καλῶς κατὰ νοῦν ἱχώρει αὐτῷ, ib. x. 15. 4,—πῶς οὖν οὐ χωρεῖ τοῦργον; Aristoph. Pax 464, seem also to illustrate this meaning.

^{38.]} We have the same remarkable relation between λαλεῖν and ποιεῖν, as in ver. 28: except that here the ποιεῖν is applied to the Jews only; λαλεῖν being used in the same comprehensive sense as there.

But notice the distinction in the restored text between ἰωρακα παρὰ τῷ πατρὶ and ἠκούσατε παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς, ὁ πατὴρ being a common term, and the articles possessive. Jesus was πρὸς τὸν θεόν, in a relation of abiding unity with His Father: they were ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς τοῦ διαβ.,—he was the suggester of their course, the originator of their acts. Jesus was the υἱός, who remains in the house and sees the father's acts: they the δοῦ-λοι, merely prescribed to and under bondage.

The οὖν implies accordingly,— by the same rule. 39, 40.] There is a distinction between στέρμα and τέκνα.
 The former our Lord grants that they were (ver. 37), but the latter (by implication; see below on the construction) He denies them. See Rom. ix. 7, οὐ γὰρ πάντες οἱ ἐξ Ἰσραὴλ, οὐτοὶ Ἰσραὴλ: οὐδ' οἱ εἰσὶν στέρμα Ἀβραάμ, πάντες τέκνα.
 The latter betokens likeness, true genuine descent in character and habits. The reading in the text is remarkable as connecting together the present ἴστε and the imperfect ἰποεῖτε. In such a case there must be a suppressed change of meaning between the protasis and the apodosis.
 The εἰ ἴστε concedes, in a certain sense:
 the ἰποεῖτε denies, by making an assumption at variance with present fact. The sentence is in fact a combination of a pro-tasis of one form with an apodosis of another. It might have been, a) εἰ ἴστε . . . , ποιεῖτε; or, b) εἰ ἴστε . . . , ἰποεῖτε.
 But as it stands, protasis a) is joined with apodosis b): and thereby the τέκνα τοῦ

xvi. 15 ff.; xx. 30 al. ^{42.} 'If you were the children of God, the ethical proof, as Luthardt well calls it, of such descent would be, that you would love Me, who am παρ' ἐξοχῆν the Son of God, and who am come by the mission, and bearing the character, of God.' ἤκω conveys the result of ἐξηλθον, as Meyer; who also remarks that mere sending will not exhaust ἐξηλθον, which must be taken metaphysically, of the proceeding forth of the Eternal Son from the essence of the Father.

^{43.} λαλιαν γινώσκων is to understand the idiom or dialect in which a man speaks, λαλ. being his manner of speech;—see Matt. xxvi. 73, and Cant. iv. 3, LXX. Why do ye not understand my speech? as E. V. But this of course does not here refer to the mere outward expression of the Lord's discourses, but to the spiritual idiom in which He spoke, and which can only be spiritually understood. Then ὁ λόγος ὁ ἐμὸς is the matter of those discourses, the Word itself.

The connexion of the two clauses is, Why, &c.! Because ye cannot receive, hear with the inner ear (see ref., and ch. vi. 60), that which I say. And the verification and ground of this cannot, is in the next verse. Meyer remarks, that in questions and answers, the emphatic words come last—being here γινώσκετε and τὸν λόγον τ. ἐμόν.

^{44.} The first article τοῦ is important, and to be rendered (against Meyer) as in E. V., your father the devil. This verse is one of the most decisive testimonies for the objective personality of the devil. It is quite impossible to suppose an accommodation to Jewish views, or a metaphorical form of speech, in so solemn and direct an assertion as this.

Θέλετε ποιεῖν is important, and should have been in E. V. more marked: Your will is to do; or, as A. V. R. "ye love to do." It indicates, as in ch. v. 40, the freedom of the human will, as the foundation of the condemnation of the sinner.

ἄνθρωποκτόνος] The most obvious reference seems to be, to the murder of Abel by Cain;—see the Apostle's own comment on these words, 1 John iii. 12, 15. But this itself was only a result of the introduction of death by sin, which was the work of the devil; Adam and Eve were the first whom he murdered. But then again both these were only manifestations of the fact here stated by divine omniscience respecting him: that he was ἄνθρωποκτόνος.

ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, the author and bringer in of that hate which is ἄνθρωποκτονία, 1 John iii. 15. The mention of murder is introduced because the Jews went about to kill Jesus; and the typical parallel of Cain and Abel is certainly hinted at in the words: see Lücke's note, ii. 338 ff., and Stier, iv. 414 (2nd edn.) ff.

οὐχ ἔστηκεν, not 'abode not,' E. V.; a sense which ἔστηκεν will not bear, being always present in meaning, and = 'I have placed myself,' i. e. I stand: see Matt. xii. 47; xx. 6; Mark ix. 1; xi. 5; John iii. 29; Acts i. 11; vii. 33; Rom. v. 2; xi. 20 al. fr.: whereas the pluperfect, εἰστήκειν, 'I had placed myself,' i. e. place forms no exception, is shewn by ὅτι οὐκ ἔστιν (not ἦν) immediately following. But as the account of this present sense shews, it is not a mere present, but a present dependent on and commencing with an implied past fact. And that fact here is, the fall of the devil, which was not an insulated act, but in which state of apostasy from the truth he ζωτῆκεν,—it is his status. So Euthym.: ἰμῖντι, ἀναπαύσαι. ἡ ἀλήθεια, as De Wette remarks, is objective: the truth of God:—in this he standeth not, because there is no truth ('truthfulness,' subjective) in him. His lie has become his very nature, and therefore he is thoroughly alien from the truth of God. To take ὅτι as 'not the cause, but the proof' (for, i. e. 'for we see it by this, that' . . .) is not only to do violence to construction, but to overthrow the whole sense of the passage.

τὸ ψεῦδος, a lie; generic: we in English have retained the article in the expression 'to speak the truth,' but not in the corresponding one. He ἐλάλει τὸ ψεῦδος to Eve.

ἐκ τ. 13., of his own, as E. V., not, 'according to his character' (De Wette),—but 'out of his own resources,' 'treasures': see Matt. xii. 35.

ὁ πατ. αὐτοῦ] i. e. either τοῦ ψεύδους—(absolutely, or as understood in ψεύστης,—Orig., Euthym., Theophyl., &c. Nitzsch [Theol. Zeitschrift, 1822], De Wette, Lücke, Wordsw., and Winer, § 22. 3. b),—or τοῦ ψεύστου (= τῶν ψευστῶν), of the liar generally. The former is not the fact,—for the devil is not the father τοῦ ψεύδους, but τῶν ψευστῶν, by being himself one whose very nature has become τὸ ψεῦδος. Certainly by this he has become the author, promoter, of falsehood among men; but this kind of paternity is not here in question: the object being to shew that he was the father of these lying Jews. I therefore hold the latter interpretation, with Bengel, Meyer, and Stier. The construction of this passage with the art. bef. πατήρ has presented insuperable difficulty to Middleton and others: see Midd. in I rendering which he proposes. "When (any of you) speaks that false, he speaks after the manner kindred (ἐκ τῶν ἰδίων!), for he and so also is his father," i. e. t To which the late Prof. Scholefield an emendation, to take away the after ἐστίν, and translate, "For he also is a liar," not knowing, ap that this was the ancient heretic pretation according to which the αὐτοῦ was the Demiurge: see Me 3, and Hilgenfeld, referred to by supporting this rendering. It is most incredible that learned men, of our Lord's discourses, should uphold an interpretation so utter and preposterous. It is only an how the judgment may be warped adoption of canons respecting the grounded on insufficient observation instances which Middleton add prove that according to the ordering, the article must be omitted πατήρ, none of them touch the c The article here is emphatic, and c be omitted, any more than in the: ἐγὼ εἶμι ὁ ἀπὸς τῆς ζωῆς. The account to be given of this constr that it = ὅτι ψεύστης ἐστίν, καὶ αὐτῶν: but by ψεύστης being s the pronoun is attracted into the also.

45.] And the very reason we do not believe Me (as contrast him) is, because I speak the truth not being of the truth, but of his falsehood itself. This implies a wilful striving against known and sized truth. Euthymius fills up t text—εἰ μὲν ἔλεγον ψεῦδος, ἐπιστοι μοι ἂν, ὡς τὸ ἴδιον τοῦ πατρὸς λέγοντι: see ch. v. 43. 46.] ἡ here is strictly sin: not 'error' or 'ment,' or 'falsehood.' they would introduce in this most solemn part of our Lord's discourse, a rapid tautology. The question is an appeal to His sinlessness of life, as evident to them all,—as a pledge for His truthfulness of word: which word asserted, be it remembered, that He was sent from God. And when we recollect that He who here challenges men to convict him of sin, never could have upheld outward spotlessness merely (see Matt. xxiii. 26—28), the words amount to a declaration of His absolute sinlessness, in thought, word, and deed. Or, the connexion may be as stated by Euthym.: εἰ μὴ διότι τὴν ἀλήθειαν λέγω ἀπιστεῖτέ μοι, εἰπατε, τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν ἐλγχει με περὶ ἀμαρτίας ὑπ' ἐμοῦ γενομένης, ἵνα δόξητε δι' ἐκείνην ἀπιστεῖν; εἰ ἄλ. λέγ. And if it be thence (from the impossibility of convicting me of sin) evident, that I speak the truth, why do ye not believe Me? (not πιστ. εἰς ἐμὲ, but simply μοι, give credence to Me.)

47.] gives the answer to the διὰ τί, and concludes the discourse with the final disproof of their assertion, ver. 41,—with, as it were, a 'quod erat demonstrandum.' This verse is cited 1 John iv. 6.

48.] The Jews attempt no answer, but commence reviling Him. These are now properly οἱ Ἰουδ.,—the principal among the Jews. Σαμ. So they called 'outcasts from the commonwealth of Israel:' and so afterwards they called the Christians Ὀυνοῖ, from ἡρῶν (2 Kings xvii. 24). They imply, that He differed from their interpretation of the law,—or perhaps, as He had convicted them of not being the genuine children of Abraham, they cast back the charge with a senseless 'Tu quoque.' There may perhaps be a reference to the occurrence related in ch. iv. 5 ff.; but Schöttgen (p. 371) has shewn that "Sama- ritanus es" is found in the Rabbis as addressed to one whose word is not to be believed.

κ. Σαμ. δχ.] 'As in the first clause they sundered Him from the communion of Israel, so now from that of Israel's God.' Stier. Or perhaps they mean the reproach more as expressing aggravated madness owing to demoniacal possession. The καλῶς λέγομεν connects with the charge twice brought against Him by the Pharisees, 'of casting out devils by the prince of the devils.'

49.] The former term of reproach Jesus passes over ('cum jam inter Samaritanos haberet, qui in eum credebant.' Lampe; but qu.?), and mildly answers (1 Pet. ii. 23) the malicious charge of having a devil, by an appeal to his whole life and teaching (see ch. iv. 34), which was not the work of one having a devil. There is no revert of the charge in the emphatic ἐγὼ, as Cyr. and Lücke; this, as Meyer observes, would have required οὐκ ἐγὼ. At present the ἐγὼ followed by ὑμεῖς only brings out the two parties into stronger contrast.

κ. ὑμ. ἀτ. με] The ἐγὼ and ὑμεῖς correspond strictly to the ἡμεῖς and σὺ of the preceding verse. 'Our mutual relation is not that, but this: that I honour Him that sent me, and ye, in dishonouring me, dishonour Him.' It is the same contrast, the ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ and οὐκ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, as before, ver. 47, which lies at the root.

50.] 'Ye dishonour me;—not that I seek my own honour, but His who sent me. There is One who seeketh my honour (ch. v. 23), and will have me honoured; and who judgeth between me and you, between truth and falsehood.' Supply τ. δόξαν μου after ζητῶν, but not after ἐρίων.

51.] There is no pause (De Wette) between ver. 50 and this. This is the direct carrying on of the dis-

Lücke remarks, all unbiassed exegesis of these words must recognize in them a declaration of the essential præ-existence of Christ. All such interpretations of πρὶν Ἀ. γεν., as 'before Abraham became Abraham,' i. e. father of many nations (Socinus and others), and of ἐγὼ εἶμι, as 'I was predetermined, promised by God' (Grotius and the Socinian interpreters), are little better than dishonest quibbles. The distinction between γενέσθαι and εἶμι is important. 'Antequam nasceretur Abraham, ego sum' (Erasmus.) The present εἶμι expresses essential existence, as in reff., especially Col. i. 17, and was often used by our Lord to assert His divine Being. In this verse the God-head of Christ is involved; and this the Jews clearly understood, by their conduct to Him.

59.] Probably there were stones (for building) lying about in the outer court of the temple, where these words seem to have been spoken. The reason of the Jews' doing this is given by them on a similar occasion, ch. x. 33, ὅτι σὺ ἄνθρωπος ὢν ποιεῖς σεαυτὸν θεόν.

There does not appear to be any miraculous escape intended here, although certainly the assumption of one is natural under the circumstances. Jesus was probably surrounded by His disciples, and might thus hide Himself (see ch. xii. 36), and go out of the temple.

CHAP. IX. X.] JESUS THE LIGHT, FOR THE HEALING OF THE WORLD AND THE JUDGMENT OF THE JEWS.

IX. 1—41.] Manifestation of Jesus as the Light by a miracle. Judgment of the Jews by the healed man, and by Jesus.

1.] This, if the concluding words of ch. viii. in the rec. are genuine, would appear to have happened on the same day, which is hardly likely, for we should thus have the whole incidents from ch. vii. 37 (omitting ch. vii. 53—viii. 12), belonging to one day, and that day a sabbath (ver. 14). And besides, the circumstances under which Je appears are too unusual and tranquil succeeded immediately to His ex ch. viii. 59. I would rather therefore pose that there is a break between verse: how long, we cannot of course. Thus we have the commencement of a narrative here, as in ch. vi. 1, and This is the view of Lücke, Tholuck, De Wette; Olshausen, Meyer, and believe it to have been the same day the former refers the ἡν σάββ. (ver. its being the last day of the feast 37, where see note).

The bli was sitting begging (ver. 8), possibly claiming the fact of his having been born; for otherwise the disciples hardly have asked the following question. The incident may have been in the neighbourhood of the temple (Acts iii. 2) doubtless there were other places where beggars sat, besides the temple entrance.

2.] According to Jewish law every infirmity was the punishment of sin (see ver. 34). From Exod. xx. the prevailing views on the subject the disciples may have believed that the man was visited for the sins of his parents, but how could he himself have been before his birth? Beza and Grotius the question to the doctrine of metempsychosis; that he may have sinned in his former state of existence; this he is disproved by Lightfoot and Lücke. The Pharisees believed that the good only passed into other bodies, which exclude this case (see Joseph. Antt. 1. 8, and B. J. ii. 8. 14). Light Lücke, and Meyer refer it to the heredity of sin in the womb; Tholuck predestinated sin, punished by action: De Wette to the general doctrine of the præ-existence of souls, which was vailed both among the Rabbis and the Gnostics; see Wiesl. viii. 19, 20 applicability of which passage is do by Stier, iv. 455 note, edn. 2). So Isidore of Pelusium in the Catena (Lücke, ii. 372), οὗτος, ὅς φασιν Ἕλληνες, — ἡ οἱ γονεῖς αὐτοῦ, ὅς φασιν Ἰουδαῖοι. The question may have been asked vaguely without any strict application of it to the circumstances, merely taking for granted that some ein must have led to the blindness, and hardly thinking of the non-applicability of one of the suppositions to this case. Or perhaps, as Stier inclines to suppose, the οὗτος, *q*f may mean, 'this man, or, for that is out of the question (bisher selbst, oder, da uns dies doch nicht denkbar ist, . . .), his parents?' ἵνα as a cause why he should be . . . , — used τελικῶς: — not ικαριστικῶς (Olah.), expressing the mere consecution of events.

3.] After αὐτοῦ supply ἵνα τ. γεν.—'neither of these was the cause; but τυφ. ἰγεννηθῇ, in order that . . . ' But how so? οὐ κολαστικῶς, ἀλλ' οἰκονομικῶς. Euthym. In the economy of God's Providence, his suffering had its place and aim, and this was to bring out the ἔργα τοῦ θ. in his being healed by the Redeemer (see Rom. xi. 11 and note). So Lücke:—De Wette denies the interpretation, and refers the saying merely to the view of our Lord to bring out his own practical design, to make use of this man to prove His divine power. But see ch. xi. 4, which is strictly parallel.

4.] Connected by ἐργάζ. τ. ἔργα to the former verse. There certainly seems to be some reference to its being the sabbath; see the similar expressions in ch. v. 17. From ὅταν . . . , in ver. 5, it seems evident that ἡμέρα is the appointed course of the working of Jesus on earth, and νύξ the close of it (see the parallel, ch. xi. 9, 10). It is true, that, according to John's universal diction, the death of Jesus is His glorification; but the similitude here regards the effect on the world, see ver. 5; and the language of Rom. xiii. 12 is in accordance with it, as also Luke xxii. 53; John xiv. 30.

5.] This partly explains the ἡμ. and νύξ of the former verse, partly alludes to the nature of the healing about to take place. As before the raising of Lazarus (ch. xi. 25), He states that He is the Resurrection and the Life; so now, He sets forth Himself as the source of the archetypal spiritual light, of which the natural, now about to be conferred, is only a derivation and symbol.

6.] see reff. Mark. The virtue especially of the saliva sejuma, in cases of disorders of the eyes, was well known to antiquity. Pliny, H. N. xxviii. 7, says, 'Lippitudines matutina quotidie velut inunctione arceri.' In both accounts (Suet. Vesp. 7; Tacitus, Hist. iv. 8) of the restoring of a blind man to sight attributed to Vespasian, the use of this remedy occurs. See also Wetstein in loc. (Trench, Miracles, 293 note, edn. 2). The use of clay also for healing the eyes was not unknown. Serenus Samonicus (in the time of Caracalla) says: 'Si tumor insolitus typho se tollat inani, Turgentes oculos vili circumline cæno.'

No rule can be laid down which our Lord may seem to have observed, as to using, or dispensing with, the ordinary human means of healing. He Himself be much more likely to turn on whether he was really the person who had sat and begged (the blindness being involved in it), than on the fact of his having been blind.

11.] ἀνέβλ., strictly speaking, is inappropriate in the case of one born blind. Lücke refers to Aristotle as using the word thus, and cites Pausanias, who speaks of Ὀφυνία . . . τὸν τε γενεῆς τυφλόν, whom ἐπέλαβε τῆς κεφαλῆς ἀλγῆμα ἰσχυρόν, καὶ ἀνέβλεψεν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ. Sight being natural to men, the deprivation of it is regarded as a loss, and the reception of it, though never enjoyed before, as a recovery. So Grotius : "nec male recipere quis dicitur, quod communiter tributum humanæ naturæ ipsi abfuit." There is no emphasis on μου here (as Dr. Wordsw.) nor in vv. 15, 30 : nor on σου in vv. 10, 17, 26. See on Matt. xvi. 18, and compare Luke xii. 18. 13.] The neighbours appear to have brought him to the Pharisees, out of hostility to Jesus (see ver. 12) : and ver. 14 alleges the reason of this :—or perhaps from fear of the sentence alluded to in ver. 22. The "Pharisees" here may have been the court presiding over the synagogue, or one of the lesser local courts of Sanhedrim. Lücke inclines to think they were an assembly of the great Sanhedrim, whom John sometimes names of Φαρ. ;—see ch. vii. 47 ; xi. 46 : Meyer regards them as some formal section of the Pharisees, as a body : but were there such? 14.] Lightf. cites from a Rabbinical treatise on the Sabbath, 'sputum etiam super palpebras poni prohibitum.' But the making the clay, as a servile work, seems to be here prominently mentioned.

Meyer notices,—and it is interesting, as a minute mark of accuracy,—that the man only relates what he himself, as being blind, felt : he says nothing of the spittle. 15.] πάλιν refers to ver. 10. The enquiry was official, as addressed to the chief witness in the matter. We cannot hence infer with Lücke that no one else was present at the

τός. 22.] It is not said when this resolution was come to; and this also speaks for an interval between ch. vii., viii., and this incident. It could hardly have been before the council at the conclusion of ch. vii. [ἄποσυν.] Probably the first of the three stages of Jewish excommunication,—the being shut out from the synagogue and household for thirty days, but without any anathema. The other two,—the repetition of the above, accompanied by a curse,—and final exclusion,—would be too harsh, and perhaps were not in use so early. Trench (Mirr. 299, edn. 2) regards the resolution not as a token that the Sanhedrim had pronounced Him a false Christ, but as shewing that they forbade a private man to anticipate their decision on this point by confessing Him (?). 24. 22s 8. r. 0.] not, 'Give God the praise' (E. V.), i. e. 'the glory of thy healing': for the Pharisees want to overawe the man by their authority, and make him deny the miracle altogether. The words are a form of adjuration (see ref. Josh.), to tell the truth, q. d. 'Remember that you are in God's presence, and speak as unto Him.'

VOL. I.

25. 25v.] See on ver. 8. The man shrewdly evades the inference and states again the simple fact. Bear in mind, that 25v must here be strictly kept to its present sense as being joined with a present verb βλέπω: the rule for the construction of a pres. part. being, that it is contemporaneous with the verb which rules the time of the sentence. So that we must render, not "whereas I WAS blind, now I see," as E. V.: but as A. V. R., being a blind man, now I see. The shrewd and naïve disposition of the man furnishes the key to the enigmatical expression. He puts it to them as the problem, the fact of which he knows for certain but the reason of which it was for them to solve, that he, whom they all knew as a blind man, now saw. So that the 25v carries not so much present matter of fact, as common designation and title. 26.] They perhaps are trying to shake his evidence,—or to make him state something which should bring out some stronger violation of the sabbath.

27.] οὐκ ἠκούσατε must be in its special meaning of 'did not heed it.' The latter clause is of course ironical:

seems to be an interval between the last verse and this, and the narrative appears to be taken up again at some subsequent time when this miracle became again the subject of discourse. The blind man had recovered sight in two senses,—bodily and spiritual. And as our Lord always treats of the spiritual as paramount, in-

The "becoming blind," on the other hand, is partly an ironical expression for remaining blind, but partly also has a real meaning in the increasing darkening and harden-referring primarily to the unbelief of the Pharisees and their rejection of Him. And He says, 'If ye were really blind (not, 'confessed yourselves blind'; Kuinoel, Stier, De Wette), ye would not have incurred guilt; but now ye say, "We see;" ye believe ye have the light, and boast that ye know and use the light; and therefore your guilt abideth, remaineth on you.' Observe there is a middle clause understood, between 'ye would never have incurred guilt,' and 'your guilt remaineth;' and that is, 'ye have incurred guilt;' which makes it necessary to take the λέγετε ὅτι βλέπομεν as in a certain sense implying βλέπετε: viz. 'by the Scriptures being committed to you, by God's grace, which ought to have led you to faith in me.'

CHAP. X. 1—21.] Of true and false shepherds. Jesus the good Shepherd. This discourse is connected with the preceding miracle; and the conduct of the Pharisees towards the man who had been blind, seems to have given occasion to this description of false shepherds, which again introduces the testimony of Jesus to Himself as the true Shepherd. So that, as Meyer remarks, the paragraph should begin at ch. ix. 35 properly. The more we study carefully this wonderful Gospel, the more we shall see that the idea of this close connexion is never to be summarily dismissed as imaginary, and that our Evangelist never 'passes without notice to an entirely different and disjointed occurrence or discourse,' as I stated in some of my former editions. See on the whole subject of the parable, Jer. xxxiii. 1—4; Ezek. xxxiv.; Zech. xi. 4—17. These opening verses (to ver. 5) set forth the distinction between false and true shepherds. Then (vv. 7, 8, 9) He brings in Himself, as the door, by which both shepherds and sheep enter the fold. Then (ver. 10) He returns to the imagery of the first verses, and sets forth Himself as THE GOOD SHEPHERD and the rest (to ver. 18) is of the results and distinctions of that fact. 1. τὴν αὐτὴν] ὁ ποιμὴν ε. ὑπάειρος τόπος (Phavorii ii. 403); just answering, except being a permanent enclosure, to This fold is the visible Church primarily, as His people Israel peculiar fold; the possibility of other folds has been supposed luded to in ver. 16: but see r

φ. αὐ. ἀκ.] The voice of every such true shepherd is heard (heeded, understood) by the sheep (generally): and he calls by name his own sheep, that portion of the great flock entrusted to him, and leads them out to pasture, as his office is.

This distinction between τὰ πρόβ. and τὰ ὅσα πρόβ. has given rise to exegetical and doctrinal mistakes, from not observing ποιμὴν above. It has been imagined that Christ is here spoken of, and that therefore these two descriptions of sheep must be different, and so the whole exposition has been confused. Even Stier has fallen into this mistake.

4.] When he has led forth (ἐκβάλλειν = ἐξάγειν) to pasture all his sheep (there shall not an hoof be left behind), he goes before them (see "the Land and the Book," p. 202); in his teaching pointing out the way to them; they follow him, because they know his voice; his words and teaching are familiar to them. But observe that the expression here becomes again more general; not τὰ πρ., but τὰ πρ. as in ver. 3. The sheep know the voice of every true shepherd.

5.] So that the ἄλλοτρίος is not the shepherd of another section of the flock, but an alien: the ληστής of ver. 1; —and τῶν ἄλλ. is generic, as in E. V. Meyer takes it as merely meaning a stran- ger, one who is not their Shepherd: but this hardly seems strong enough for the context.

6.] παροιμία is not = παραβολή, as so generally set down. This is not properly a parable: but rather a parabolic allegory. The parable requires narrative to set it forth; and John relates no such. The right word for παροιμία would be allegory: etymologically it is, any saying diverging from the common way of speech (παρ οἶμον): cf. Meyer. We have other examples in ch. xv. 1 ff. and in Matt. ix. 37, 38.

7.] What follows is not so much an exposition, as an expansion of the allegory. The key to this verse is the right understanding of what went before. Bear in mind, that vv. 1—5 were of shepherds in general. But these shepherds themselves go into and out of the fold by the same door as the sheep: and Christ is that door; THE DOOR OF THE SHEEP: the one door both for sheep and shepherds, into the fold (see ἡ θύρα, absol. ver. 9), into God's Church, to the Father.

8.] I believe that the right sense of these words, ὅσοι ἤλθον πρὸ ἐμοῦ, has not been apprehended by any of the Commentators. First, they can only be honestly understood of time: all who came before me (not, 'without regard to me,' Olsh. &c., nor 'passing by me member the connexion of these discourses.

He has taught the Jews that Abraham and the prophets entered by Him (ch. viii.
56): but He has set in strong opposition to Himself and His, them (these Jews) and their father, the Devil (ib. ver. 44).
He was 'the first thief who clomb into God's fold'; and all his followers are here spoken of inclusively in the language of the allegory, as coming in by and with him. His was the first attempt to lead human nature, before Christ came; before the series of dispensations of grace began, in which pasture and life is offered to man by Him. Meyer understands the Pharisees, &c. who taught the people before Christ appeared as the Door of the sheep: but this does not seem to reach the depth of the requirements of the saying. εἰσίν, not ἦσαν, because their essential nature as belonging to and being of the evil one is set forth, and the inclusion of these present Pharisees in their ranks.

ἀλλ' οὐκ . . .] This of course cannot be understood absolutely, — 'the sheep never for one moment listened to them;' but, did not listen to them in the sense of becoming their disciples eventually. So that the fall of our first Parents would be no exception to this; whom of all men we must conclude, by the continuing grace and mercy of God (after that fall, to have been of) sheep. And since then, the same however the sheep may for a while to these false shepherds, they do not them, so as to follow them. The do, belong not to the true flock. 9.] expands and fixes ver. 7. 'salutaris aditus in ecclesiam, nisi sive pastor esse velis, sive ovias.' E Paraphr. See Numb. xxvii. 16, 17, sequel of the verse shews that the bined meaning is the true one. who understands it all of shepherd finds great difficulty in the interp of the latter words: "shall go in: before the sheep, and find past them."

10.] the gracious in the Saviour in this; — to give life, abundance. This verse forms the sition from Him as ἡ θύρα, to ἡ ποιμὴν. He is here set in opposit εἰσέρχας (see on ver. 8), and thus in passes into the place of a ποιμὴν, been hitherto thus opposed. Τὴ ζωὴν ἔχωσιν binds on to νομὴν εἰ, and καὶ περισσ. ἔχ.: q. d. not mer door to pass through, but actively dantly, to bestow abundance of lif are thus prepared for — feast had become usual since the time when Judas Maccabæus purified the temple from the profanations of Antiochus. It was held on Chisleu (December) 25, and seven following days : see 1 Macc. iv. 41—59; 2 Macc. x. 1—8; Jos. Antt. xii. 7. 7.

χειμ. ἦν] it was winter (not 'stormy weather,' as Lampe, al : Matt. xvi. 3) : see above. The notice is inserted to explain to Gentile readers the reason of our Lord's walking in Solomon's portico. This latter was on the east side of the temple, called also by Jos. στοὰ ἀνατολική. He says, Antt. xx. 9. 7, that it was an original work of Solomon, which had remained from the former temple.

^{24.]} ψυχὴν αἵρεις is generally explained, 'keep us in doubt,' αἰσπεῖς, ἀναρῆς μεταδὲ πιστεῖς κ. ἀπιστίας, Euthym. But there is some question whether ψ. αἰρ. is ever so used. In Josephus, it signifies 'to uplift the soul,' 'raise the courage,' ἰσὶ τὸν κινδ. τὰς ψ. ἡρμῖνοι, Antt. iii. 2. 3; 5. 1. So also Aquila, Prov. xix. 18, πρὸς τὸ θανατῶσαι αὐτὸν μὴ ἄρῃς ψ. σου. See also Pa. lxxxv. 4; cxlii. 8 (LXX). These usages, however, as all the examples adduced in the comm., are confined to the act of a man on his own soul : when the term applies to effects produced on another, it seems to imply any strong excitement of mind, whether for hope or fear. How long dost thou excite our minds?

^{25.]} He had often told them, in unmistakable descriptions of Himself : see ch. v. 19; viii. 36, 56, 58, &c. &c. But the great reference here is to His works, as in ver. 37.

Observe the sharp contrast of ἐγὼ and ὑμεῖς.

^{26.]} The difficulty of καθὼς εἶπον ὑμῖν is considerable warrant for its genuineness : and it comes much more naturally with this than with the following verse. I believe it to refer more to the whole allegory, than to any explicit saying of this kind; and this is shewn to my mind by the following words in ver. 27 :—the minor proposition, 'but ye hear not my voice,' being understood. This was a corollary from the allegory, and thus it might be said καθὼς εἶπον ὑμῖν. This reference to the allegory some two months after it was spoken, has been used by the rationalists as an argument against the authenticity of the narrative. But, as Meyer observes, it in reality implies that the conflict with the Jewish authorities is here again taken up after that interval, during which it had not broken out.

^{27—29.]} This leads to a further description of these sheep. The form of the sentence is a climax; rising through the ἐγὼ δίδωμι and ἐκ τ. χ. μου, to ἐπατήρ μου δὲ δίδωκεν μοι, and ἐκ τ. χ.

Its result as regards Lazarus will not be death (see Matt. ix. 24 ||, and notes):—but (see ch. ii. 11; ix. 3) it has a higher purpose,—the glory of God;—the glorification, by its means, of the Son of God. And this δοξασθῇ—how was it accomplished? By this miracle leading to his death,—which in John's diction is so frequently implied in that word. (It need hardly be remarked, with Olsh. and Trench, that the glorifying of the Son of God in Lazarus himself is subordinately implied. Men are not mere tools, but temples, of God.) It is doubtful whether these words were the answer sent back to the sisters, or were said to the disciples. In either case, they evidently carried a double meaning, as again those in ver. 11. 5.] explains ἐν φιλαίς. Observe ἡγάπα here; while we have ἐν φιλαίς in ver. 3, where there was no possibility of misunderstanding the import: cf. note on Matt. v. 46, and Trench, New Test. Synonyms, p. 45. 6.] οὖν connects with ver. 4, 'Having then said this,—although He loved, &c., He abode,' &c.: μὲν pointing on to ἔπειτα μ. τ. in next verse. In all probability Lazarus was dead, when He spoke the words ver. 4;—or at all events before the messenger returned. 7.] If the οὖν in ver. 6 referred to this verse, the connexion must have been made by καὶ μετὰ τ.: the ἔπειτα cuts off all connexion (Gal. i. 18), and throws back the οὖν as explained above. The question, why our Lord did not go on receiving the message, is not to be answered by any secondary reasons, such as the trial of the faith of those concerned, or the pressing nature of His own ministry in Perea,—but by referring back to ver. 4,—because, for the glory of God, He would have the miracle happen as it did and no otherwise. Compare Meyer. 8.] νῦν = ἀπρὶς—but now. ἐξήτουν, were seeking: ἐπάγει, art thou going? 9, 10.] Our Lord's answer is first general, vv. 9, 10,—then particular, ver. 11. οὐχὶ δὲ. See on ch. ix. 4, where the same thought is expressed. But here it is carried further,—'I have a fixed time during which to work, appointed me by my Father; during that time I fear no danger, I walk in His light, even as the traveller in the light of this world by day: and (by inference) ye too are safe, walking in this light, which light to you is myself,—walking with me:—whosoever walks without this light,—without me,—without

In him, for 'the light of the body is the eye,' and the light must be in us in order to guide us. Shut it out by blinding the eyes, and we are in darkness. So too of spiritual light. The twelve-hour division of the day was common among the Jews by this time, being probably borrowed from Babylon (οἱ Ἕλληνες τὰ δωδεκα μίρεα τῆς ἡμέρας παρὰ Βαβυλωνίων ἱμαθον, Herod. ii. 109). As the day in Palestine varied in length from 14h. 12m. in summer to 9h. 48m. in winter, these hours must also have varied considerably in length at the different seasons (see Winer, Realwört. art. 'Tag'). I may remark that this verse refutes the fancy of Townson and others, recently upheld by Dr. Wordsworth (who passes this verse without remark), that St. John adopts the so-called Asiatic method of reckoning time: see on ch. i. 40; iv. 6, al.

with Lazarus, as Grot.). This is in exact accord with the character of Thomas, as shewn in ch. xiv. 5; xx. 25;—ever ready to take the dark view, but deeply attached to his Lord. 17.] Jesus remained two days after the receipt of the message: one day the journey would occupy: so that Lazarus must have died on the day of the messenger's being sent, and have been buried that evening, according to Jewish custom: see ver. 39, and Acts v. 6—10. 18.] The geographical notice is given, to account for the occurrence detailed in the next verse. A stadium = $\frac{1}{2}$ of a Roman mile. Meyer remarks, that ην does not necessarily imply that the places no longer existed when the Apostle wrote, but may arise from the word occurring in context with a history which is past. So Xen. Anab. i. 4. 9, οι δε κωμοι εν ολις λοκηνον Παρυσιαδος ησαν. But seeing that John alone uses this form of designation (cf. ch. xviii. 1; xix. 41), and that he probably wrote after the destruction of Jerusalem, it is more natural (as Meyer himself confesses) to explain the past tense by his regarding Jerusalem and its neighbourhood as laid waste at the time when he published his Gospel. 19.]

Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. in loc.) gives an account of the ceremonies practised during the thirty days of mourning. The rec. reading, τας περι M. s. M., would mean Martha and Mary and their friends—the women mourning with them. The expression is foreign to N. T. diction elsewhere, and might be used here for decorum, seeing that they were women who came: or as indicating that the house was one of large hospitality and acquaintance.

20.] The behaviour of the two sisters is quite in accordance with their character, Luke x. 38—42: and thus we have a most interesting point of connexion between two gospels so widely various in their contents and character. Stier thinks (v. 19, edn. 2), as also Trench (Mirr. 398, edn. 2), that Mary did not hear of the approach of Jesus, and that we must not bring the characters to bear on this case (?).

21.] This saying has evidently been the leading thought of the four days since their brother's death. Mary repeats it, ver. 32.

22.] She seems to express some expectation of the raising of her brother; but it is too great a thing for her to venture to mention:—possibly she had not dared to form the thought fully, but had some vague feeling after help, such as she knew He would give. I can hardly see, as some have done, a 'verbum minus dignum' (Bengel) in the form of her expression, ὅσα ἂν αἰτήσῃ τὸν θ. κ.τ.λ. It was said in the simplicity of her faith, which, it is true, was not yet a fully ripened faith: but it differs little from our Lord's own words, ver. 41.

The repetition of ὁ θεός after τὸν θεόν is to be noticed, as expressive of her faith in the unity of purpose and action between Jesus and God.

23.] I believe these words of our Lord to contain no allusion to the immediate restoration of Lazarus; but to be pedagogically used, to lead on to the requisite faith in her mind. I have to learn whether ἀναστήσεται in this direct absolute sense could be used of his recall into human life.

24.] She understands the words rightly, but gently repels the insufficient comfort of his ultimate resurrection.

25, 26.] These words, as Stier observes, are the central point of the history; the great testimony to Himself, of which the subsequent miracle is the proof. The intention of the saying seems to have been, to awaken in Martha the faith that He could raise her brother from the dead, in its highest and proper form. This He does by announcing Himself (ἐγώ, I, and no other . . .)

RESURRECTION' (q. d.—that res in the last day shall be only by me and therefore I can raise now and more than that, THE LIFE IT that he that believeth in me (= in her mind), even though he is (ἀποθάνῃ, past) shall live; and liveth (physically, 'is not yet dead' believeth in me, shall never die; 'faith in me is the source of life here and hereafter; and those who have Life, so that they shall die;' physical death being only and disregarded, in comparison with which is really and only death. must be (against Lampe, Olshausen Stier) taken of physical life, for it opposed to κάν ἀποθάνῃ.

εἰς ἐμέ is the subject of both clauses; the former it is said that he κάν ζήσεται: in the second, that he μὴ ἀποθάνῃ. Olshausen's remark that ζών and ἀποθ. in the second clause both be physical, if one is, is wrong antithesis consisting, in both clauses reciprocation of the two senses, and spiritual; and serving in the latter clause, as a key hereafter to the case of Lazarus, whom raised from the dead.

There can hardly be any room in ver. 26 to the state of the living soul at the Lord's coming (πάντες δὲ ἀλλαγήσονται 1 Cor. xv. 51),—for although there, speaking of believers prima especially, uses the first person,—(which would be equally true of unbaptized, on whose bodies the change from the present to the ἀφθαρσία will equally pass, whom the οὐ μὴ ἀποθάνῃ here is equally true,—whereas the saying φωνεῖ σε] This is not recorded. Stier thinks that the Lord had not actually asked for her, but that Martha sees such an especial fitness for her hearing in the words of vv. 25, 26, that she uses this expression. But is it not somewhat too plainly asserted, to mean only calling by inference? Meyer regards the φωνεῖ σε as proving it to have been a fact.

of Mary are fewer, and her action more impassioned, than those of her sister: she

the Jews: cf. ver. 33. Kühner, Gram.

§ 627, ann. 4, remarks that when the genitive of the enclitic personal pronoun is prefixed to its substantive, a slight sense of the dativus commodi is given: 'non mihi frater mortuus esset.' 33.] In explaining this difficult verse, two things must be borne in mind: (1) that ἐνεβριμάμενος can bear but one meaning, that of indignor ('infremuit,' Vulg.),—the expression of indignation and rebuke, not of sorrow. This has been here acknowledged by all the expositors who have paid any attention to the usage of the word. (2) That both from ὡς εἶπεν, &c.,—from καὶ ἐτάραξεν. &c., and ver. 35,—the feeling in the Lord was clearly one of rising sympathy, which vented itself at last in tears.

These two things being premised, I think the meaning to be, that Jesus, with the tears of sympathy already rising and overcoming His speech, checked them, so as to be able to speak the words following. I would read ἐνεβρ. τ. π., καὶ ἔρ. &c., καὶ εἶπεν in immediate connexion, as expressing the temporary check given to the flow of His tears,—the effort used to utter the following question. And I would thus divest the self-restraint of all stoical and unworthy character, and consider it as merely physical, requiring indeed an act of the will, and a self-troubling,—a complication of feeling,—but implying no deliberate disapproval of the rising emotion, which indeed immediately after is suffered to prevail. What minister has not, when burying the dead in the midst of a weeping family, felt the emotion and made the effort here described? And surely this was one of the things in which He was made like unto His brethren. Thus Bengel: 'Ita Jesus austeriore affectu lacrymas hic cohibuit, et mox ver. 38 abruptit. Eoque major earum fuit auctoritas.' Meyer's explanation deserves mention: that our Lord was indignant at seeing the Jews, His bitter enemies, mingling their hy tears (Stocobistibränen) with the of the bereaved sister. But, no how unworthy this seems of th and occasion, the explanation will place in ver. 38: for surely the of the Jews in ver. 37 is not e justify it. Still perhaps any con to the solution of this difficult wt to be summarily rejected. not the dat. after ἐνεβρ., 'τοῦ πνεύματος,'—but in Spirit: see i ver. 38. Indignation over and sin, and death the fruit of sin less lay in the background; but t the words (with Olah., Stier, and seems unnatural. ἐτάραξεν understood by Meyer, and perhaps as describing an outward motion body,—He shuddered: and so E δίσσιναι: [not, as Bloomf. somewhatly asserts, a blunder of the α δισσισθῆναι, but the (so-called) intru of σείω, in which it was used of act of 'shaking' bodily; cf. 35—38.] It is probable that the second set of Jews (ver. 37) spoke with a scoffing and hostile purport: for John seldom uses οἱ as a mere copula, but generally as but: see vv. 46, 49, 51.

It is (Trench, p. 407, edn. 2) a mark of accuracy in the narrative, that these dwellers in Jerusalem should refer to a miracle so well known among themselves, rather than to the former raisings of the dead in Galilee (Strauss has made this very point an objection), of which they probably may have heard, but naturally would not thoroughly believe on rumour only. Again, of raising Lazarus none of them seem to have thought, only of preventing his death.

This second ἐμβριμᾶσθαι of our Lord I would refer to the same reason as the first. ἰδᾶκουσι μὲν, ἀφ' οὗ τὴν φύσιν ἰνδύεσθαι τὰ λαυῆς . . . εἰτα πάλιν ἐμβριμᾶται τῷ πάθει. Euthym. Only he assigns a didactic purpose, to teach us moderation in our tears; I should rather believe the self-restraint to have been exercised as a preparation for what followed.

The caves were generally horizontal, natural or artificial, —with recesses in the sides, where the bodies were laid. There is no necessity here for supposing the entrance to have been otherwise than horizontal, as the word σπήλαιον would lead us to believe. Graves were of both kinds: we have the vertically sunk mentioned Luke xi. 44. See on the whole subject, Winer, RWB. art. 'Gräber:' and cf. Isa. xxii. 16; 2 Chron. xvi. 14; 2 Kings xxiii. 16.

Probably, from this circumstance, as from 'the Jews' coming to condole,—and the costly ointment (ch. xii. 3),—the family was wealthy.

39.] The corpse had not been embalmed, but merely 'wrapped in linen clothes with spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury,'—see ch. xix. 40, and ver. 44 below. ἡ ἀδελφὴ τοῦ τετελευτηκότος, as Meyer remarks, notes the natural horror of the sister's heart at what was about to be done.

There is no reason to avoid the assumption of the plain fact (see below) stated in ἦδη ὄζει. I cannot see that any monstrous character (Olsh., Trench) is given to the miracle by it; any more than such a character can be predicated of restoring the withered hand. In fact, the very act of death is the beginning of decomposition. I have no hesitation, with almost all the ancient, and many of the best modern Commentators, in assuming ἦδη ὄζει as a fact, and indeed with Stier, believing it to be spoken not as a supposition, but as a (sensible) fact. The entrances to these vaults were not built up,—merely defended, by a stone being rolled to them, from the jackals and beasts of prey.

40.] I can hardly think she supposed merely that Jesus desired to look on the face of the dead;—she expected something was about to be done, but in her anxiety for decorum (Luke x. 40) she was willing to avoid the consequence of opening the cave. This feeling Jesus here rebukes, by referring her to the plain duty of simple faith, insisted on by Him before (vv. 25, 26? or in some other teaching?) as the condition relation of the Lord Jesus to the Father, all power is given to Him: the Son can do nothing of Himself:—and during His humiliation on earth, these acts of power were done by Him, not by that glory of His own which He had laid aside, but by the mighty working of the Father in Him, and in answer to His prayer: the dif-

 being, that His prayer was always heard,

 And this ἤκουσάς μου He states here for the benefit of the standers-by, that they might know the truth of His repeated assertions of His mission from the Father.
 At the same time He guards this, ver. 42,

 He had no more power than men who

45—57.] THE DEATH OF JESUS THE LIFE OF THE WORLD. Consequences of the miracle. Meeting of the Sanhedrim and final determination, on the prophetic intimation of the High Priest, to put Jesus to death. He retires to Ephraim.

46.] Meyer, with his usual philological acumen, takes pains to set right the understanding of this. In the last verse, it is not πολλοὶ . . . τῶν ἐλθόντων, but πολλοὶ . . . οἱ ἐλθόντες: thus identifying the πολλοὶ, with those that came: “many . . . to wit, those that came.” All these ἐπιστεύσαν εἰς αὐτόν (see a similar case in ch. viii. 30 ff.). Then, τινὲς ἐξ αὐτῶν, viz., the ἐλθόντων, and πιστεύόντων, went, &c. The 34 (see on ver. 37) certainly shews that this was done with a hostile intent: not in doubt as to the miracle, any more than in the case of the blind man, ch. ix., but with a view to stir up the rulers yet more against Him. This Evangelist is very simple, and at the same time very consistent, in his use of particles: almost throughout his Gospel the great subject, the manifestation of the Glory of Christ, is carried onward by οὖν, whereas 34 as generally prefaces the development of the antagonist manifestation of hatred and rejection of Him. If it seem strange that this hostile step should be taken by πιστεύοντες εἰς αὐτόν, we at least find a parallel in the passage above cited, ch. viii. 30 ff. 47.] Their words may be read two ways; with, or without, a question after ποιῶσιν. (1) is the ordinary way. (2) as in A. V. R., ‘What do we, seeing that,—because,—this man doeth many miracles?’ 48.] They evidently regarded the result of ‘all believing on Him,’ as likely to be, that He would be set up as king: which would soon bring about the ruin here mentioned.

Augustine (in Ev. Joh. Tract. xlix. 26) understands it differently: that, all men being persuaded by Him to peaceful lives, they would have no one to join them in revolt against the Romans; but this seems forced: for no ἐλεύσονται would in that case be provoked. τον τον] not, the temple (sc. ἅγιον, Acts vi. 13. 2 Macc. v. 19 hardly applies, being the place which the Lord chose to put His Name there, not ὁ τόπος ἡμῶν) but our place, as in ref.: i. e. our local habitation, and our national existence. Both these literally came to pass.

Whether this fear was earnestly expressed, or only as a covert for their enmity, does not appear. The ἡμῶν is emphatic, detecting the real cause of their anxiety. Respecting this man’s pretensions, they do not pretend to decide: all they know is that if he is to go on thus, THEIR status is gone. 49—52.] The counsel is given in subtlety, and was intended by Caiaphas in the sense of political expediency only. But it pleased God to make him, as High Priest, the special though involuntary organ of the Holy Spirit, and thus to utter by him a prophecy of the death of Christ and its effects. That this is the only sense to be given, appears from the consideration that the whole of vv. 51, 52 cannot for a moment be supposed to have been in the mind of Caiaphas; and to divide it and suppose the latter part to be the addition of the Evangelist, is quite unjustifiable.

54.] Observe the Ἰουδαῖοι here as the official body. He was still among Jews at Ephraim. This city is mentioned 2 Chron. xiii. 19 in connexion with Bethel, as also by Jos. B. J. iv. 9. 9. ἑγγ. τ. ἐρ., near the desert of Judah. Its situation is at present unknown (see Winer, RWB. ed. 3, sub voce). Robinson (Harmony, p. 204) supposes it to be the same with Ophrah (Josh. xviii. 23; 1 Sam. xiii. 17: not Judg. vi. 11, 24; viii. 27) and Ephron of the O. T. (2 Chron. xiii. 19, γερ. Keri; γερ. Cetibh), and the modern et-Taiyibeh, twenty R. miles from Jerusalem. ὅτι μὴ ἔλθῃ . . . ; are two separate questions, as in E. V. The making them one, is hardly grammatical, seeing that ὅτι μὴ ἔλθ. must have a future sense; whereas in that case it would be past: 'what think ye, that He is not (i. e. of His not having) come to the feast?'

57.] The import of this verse depends on the insertion or omission of the καὶ before οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς. Without it, it is merely an explanation of the people's question: For the chief priests &c.: with it, it would mean, 'And besides, the chief priests' &c.; i. e. 'not only did the people question, but' &c. The former is in my view most probable; for the command, having been given, would satisfactorily account for the questioning, and not be stated merely as coordinate with it.

ειη του οικησαι Ἀβραάμ ἐν γῇ Χαναάν, Philo de Congressu, p. 434. See numerous instances in Groswell, vol. iii. Diss. 1, where he defines the expression to be exclusive of the period named as the limit ad quem or a quo (according as πρό or μετά is used), but inclusive of the day or month or year of the occurrence specified. Thus the arrival, and anointing, at Bethany, will be on the eighth of Nisan, if the passover was on the fourteenth. That day was a Sabbath; but this makes no difficulty, as we know not from what point our Lord came, or whether He arrived at the commencement of the Sabbath, i. e. sunset,—or a little after, on Friday evening, from Jericho. 2. ἐποίησαν] It is not said who. It was (Mt. Mk.) in the house of Simon the leper. From Lazarus being there, and Martha serving, he may have been a near relative of theirs. See notes on Matt. Lazarus is mentioned throughout the incident, as forming an element in the unfolding of the hatred of the Jews which issued in the Lord's death: notice the climax, from mere connecting mention in ver. 1, then nearer connexion in ver. 2,—to his being the cause of the Jews flocking to Bethany in ver. 9,—and the joint object wit of the enmity of the chief priests, 10.

3. λίτραν] What weight ported, is uncertain: hardly (see (39) so much as a Roman pound word, originally Greek, was adopted the Aramaic, and is found in the binical writings as equivalent to a see Friedlieb, Archäologie der Leid chichte, p. 33. 7.] See note on Matt. ver. 12. To suppose that it was a remnant from that used at the burial of Lazarus, is not only fanciful, but at variance with the character of the deed as apparent in the narrative.

 The rec. reading, εἰς τ. ἡμ. τ. ἐντ. μου τηρήσκειν αὐτό, seems to be an adaptation to Mark xiv. 8, in order to escape from the difficulty of understanding how she could keep for His burial, what she poured out now. Meyer understands the text of the remnant: but Luthardt rightly observes that the history clearly excludes the idea of a remnant; cf. ἰπράθη and ἰδόθῃ. He himself, with Baumg.-Crusius, takes τηρήσῃ as past, 'Let her have kept it,' i. e. blame her not for having kept it: but this is vapid in sense, and un-grammatical. I understand the words, which, like all our Lord's proleptical expressions, have something enigmatical in them, of her whole act, not regarded as a thing past, but spoken of in the abstract as to be allowed or disallowed: Let her keep it for the day of my burial: not meaning a future day or act, but the present one, as one to be allowed.

as elsewhere in John, the Ἰουδαῖοι are not the people, but the rulers, and persons of repute: the representatives of the Jewish opposition to Jesus.

10.] ἐβουλ., not, 'came to a (formal) resolution,' but were in the mind,—had an intention: see Acts v. 33; xv. 37. The High Priests, named here and in ch. xi. 57, were of the sect of the Sadducees; and therefore disbelieved the fact of the raising of Lazarus; only viewing him as one whom it would be desirable to put out of the way, as an object of popular attention in connexion with Jesus.

11.] ἐπηγον, went away (to Bethany); there is something in the ἔν- which almost always implies away, out from under, the persons or the place in the narrative. And so here, the ἀρχιερεῖς being the main subject of the sentence, the word gets the sense of 'fell away': scil. from under their hand or power.

13—19.] The triumphal entry into Jerusalem. Matt. xxi. 1—17. Mark xi. 1—11. Luke xix. 29—44. On the chronology, see note on Matt. xxi. 1.

12.] τῇ ἐπ., i. e. on the Sunday;—see ver. 1. ἀκούσας.] From the multitude who had returned from Bethany, ver.

The order of the narrative seems to require that these people should have visited Bethany late on the Sabbath, after suns and the anointing.

13. τὰ β. τ. The articles shew that the palm-trees were on the spot: the branches of the palm trees: or perhaps (Lücke) that the custom was usual at such festivities.

βελ. The classical word is βῆλα, from the Copt bai.

14—16.] The Evangelist sees to suppose his readers already acquainted with the circumstances of the triumph entry, and therefore relates it thus concisely.

ἐπεὶ does not involve any discrepancy with the three Evangelists, but is a compendious term implying their details.

15.] The prophecy more fully cited by Matt.

16.] Important, as shewing that this, and probably other prophetic citations under similar circumstances, were the effect of the light poured into the minds of the Apostles by the Holy Spirit after the Ascension.

Notice the thrice-repeated ταῦτα, each time signifying "this which was written by the prophet," "the above citation."

¹⁷.] The testimony which they bore is given in Luke xix. 37, 38. Meyer regards the ἐφώνησεν ἐκ τοῦ μνημείου ε. ἡγείρην ἐκ νεκρῶν as an echo of their song of triumph. ¹⁸.] I see no necessity for supposing this multitude distinct from that in the last verse. We have had no account of any multitude coming from Bethany with Him, nor does this narrative imply it: and surely ὁ ὄχλος in the two verses must mean the same persons. The καὶ here does not imply another ὄχλος, but And on this account the multitude also went out to meet

ἀπῆλθεν can hardly be altogether without allusion to the fact, or likelihood, of apostasy from Judaism. It is used to signify entire devotion to Him whithersoever He might lead them, as in ref.: and thus implies escape and alienation from themselves.

latives of these Greeks. If they were from the neighbourhood of Bethsaida, they would indeed have been familiar with the person of Jesus:—but what they here requested was evidently a private interview.

²².] Andrew (ch. i. 45) was of the same city as Philip: and this reason of Philip conferring with him is perhaps implied in the τῷ ἀπὸ B. τ. Γ. Bengel remarks on this touch of nature: 'cum sodali, audet.'

ἔρχεται—so ἐπεμψί με Ἀρῖαιος κ. Ἀρράδος, Xen. Anab. ii. 4. 16. ²³.] Did the Greeks see (i. e. speak with) Jesus, or not? Certainly not, if I understand His discourse rightly. But they may have been present at, and have understood it. The substance of His answer (αὐτοῖς, to Philip and Andrew, not to the Greeks) is, that the time was now come for His glorification, which should draw all nations to Him:—but that glorification must be accomplished by His Death. The very appearance of these Greeks is to Him a token that His glorification is at hand. Stier strikingly says, "These men from the West at the end of the Life of Jesus, set forth the same as the Magi from the East at its beginning;—but they come to the Cross of the King, as those to His cradle." (R. J. v. 69, edn. 2.) The rejection of the Jews for their unbelief is the secondary subject, and is commented on by the Evangelist, vv. 37—43. ἵνα, not 'eventual,' nor "for" any thing, but most strictly of the purpose—the hour has come, that (whose object of preparation, and aim, in the eternal counsels, it has been, that) the Son should be glorified. ²⁴ thinks, that our Lord begins His action with the double asseveration ἀμὴν, on account of the unrecognition of the mind of the disciples for the elements of His Death. But St. John uses ἀμὴν ἀμὴν. The grain perishes, and is not apparent (as of dicotyledonous plants are) in plant:—see 1 Cor. xv. 36. There is more than a mere parabolic sense in the divine Will, which has fixed of the springing up of the wheat—also determined the law of the action of the Son of Man, and the analogy with the other: i. e. both Death. The symbolism here lies root of that in ch. vi., where (ὁ ἄρτος τῆς ζωῆς. αὐτὸς μὴ ὁ ἑαυτοῦ, but himself alone, with its life uncommenced, lived only within its own limits, passing on. ²⁵.] And this vine Law prevails for the disciples as for their Master:—see Matt. x note. But the saying here proclaims plainly its true extent,—by its connexion with ver. 24, and by ἐμὴ ψυχῇ is not really in the sense: as the wheat-corn retains its identity, though it die, so the ψυχῇ: the two senses are, in their dependence, one. ψυχῇ is the life in both cases the soul, in the present accept that term. ²⁶.] Connexion ministering to, or intimate union Christ (the position of Philip and less the approaching close of that ministry gives occasion to them, and is the time to which they refer.

 probable, from no occasion being specified,
 —from ver. 36,—and from the form and contents of the passage, and its reference to the foregoing remarks of the Evangelist.
 I take it—with almost all modern Commentators—to be a continuation of those remarks, substantiating them by the testimony of the Lord Himself. The words are taken mostly, but not altogether, from discourses already given in this Gospel.

 do not believe are without excuse;—be-of Himself, but of the Father, Whose will

 He should be, and give, Life to all. They who reject Him, reject Life, and (ch. iii.

There can be no reasonable doubt that this meal was the same as that at which the Lord's Supper was instituted, as related in the three Evangelists. The narrative proceeds without any break until ch. xvii. 26, after which our Lord and the disciples go to Gethsemane.

1.] πρὸ τ. ὁρ. τ. π.] How long, is not said: but probably, a very short time;—not more than one day at the most;—see ch. xviii. 28 and note. The words belong to the whole narrative following, not to εἰδὼς or ἀγαπήσας. εἰδὼς.] The view with which our Lord washed His disciples' feet, is shewn by the repeated εἰδὼς and by ἀγαπήσας . . . αὐτούς. The connexion is:—'Jesus loved His own even to the end (of His life in the flesh), and gave them in the washing of their feet a proof of His love; and to this act He was induced by the knowledge that He must soon leave this world; and although this knowledge was united (ver. 3) with the highest consciousness of His Divine mission and speedy glorification, yet this latter did not prevent Him from giving this proof of His self-humiliating love' (De Wette).

lp. 'cas, quæ lotionem impedirent.' Bengel. He put Himself into the ordinary dress of a servant. Or, which is far more probable, on the deepest grounds, did He not humble Himself so far as literally to divest Himself, and gird Himself merely, as the basest of slaves?

5.] τὸν νικ., the vessel usually at hand for such purposes. The context seems to shew that He had washed the feet of one or more before the incident of the next verse: were it not so, ἤρξατο might merely express his doing something unusual and unlooked for. φ is perhaps by attraction for θ, which would be the ordinary case after διεζωσμένος; cf. Rev. i. 13; xv. 6: or it may be dative by construction, as in Hom. II. x. 77, πὰρ δὲ ζωστήρ κείρο παναίολος, φ ῥ' ὁ γισαῖδς Ζώνηυθ', and other examples in Meyer.

6.] And (the οὖν taking up the narrative again at the ἤρξατο, q. d., 'in pursuance of this intention') He comes to Simon Peter; not first, as some have maintained, both with and without reference to the primacy of Peter:—for that would be hardly consistent (see on the preceding verse) with the context, which seems to require that the washing should have begun and been going on, before He came to Peter.

νίπτεις art Thou washing (intending to wash) my feet! He thinks the act unworthy of the Lord; even as many think that great act of Love to have been, which was typified by it. Notice that μου is enclitic, not emphatic, in which case it would be ἐμός. The having his feet washed is a matter of course: it is the Person who is about to do it that offends him.

7.] Hitherto our Lord had been silent. He emphasizes the ἐγὼ and σὺ, but so as to set forth Himself as the Master, Peter as the disciple, not wholly cognizant of His will and purpose, and therefore more properly found in subjection to it.

ὁ ἐγὼ ποιῶ] i. e. (1) this washing itself, as a lesson of humility and love, ver. 14. (2) Its symbolical meaning, vv. 9, 10. (3) The great Act of Love, the laying aside my glory, and becoming in the form of a servant, that the washing of the Holy Spirit may cleanse men.

μετὰ ταῦτα] (1) was known very soon, but (2) and (3) not till after the Spirit was given.

8.] The rash and self-opinionated apostle opposes to μετὰ ταῦτα his οὐ μὴ . . . εἰς τ. αἰῶνα. In interpreting our Lord's answer, we must remember, that He replies more to the spirit of Peter's objection, than to his words. The same well-meaning but false humility would prevent him (and does prevent many) from stooping to receive at the hands of the Lord that spiritual washing which is absolutely necessary in order to have any part in Him, Rom. viii. 9, 'If I wash thee not, thou hast no part in Me;' but the affirmative proposition is not equally true; witness the example of Judas, who was washed, but yet had no part in Jesus. the spiritual sense of washing, this is not so. Whoever is washed by Jesus, has part in Him. We are here in the realm of another and deeper logic: the act being no longer symbolic, but veritable.

9.] The warm-hearted Peter, on learning that exclusion would be the consequence of not being washed, can hardly have enough of a cleansing so precious. There surely is implied in this answer an incipient apprehension of the meaning of our Lord's words. The εαν μη νιψω σε has awakened in him, as the Lord's presence did, Luke v. 8, a feeling of his own want of cleansing, his entire pollution. This sense (Stier, Bengel, Baumgarten-Crusius) is denied by Lücke and Olsh.

10.] Reference appears to be made to the fact that one who has bathed, after he has reached his home, needs not entire washing, but only to have his feet washed from the dust of the way. This bathing, the bath of the new birth, but only yet in its foreshadowing, in the purifying effect of faith working by love, the Apostles, with one exception, had; and this for represented to them, besides its humility and brotherly love, the need of cleansing from daily even after spiritual regeneration hands of their divine Master.

verbial expression οὐκ ἔστιν δ. . . is used here in a different sense from ch. xv. 20. Here it is, 'if the Master thus humbles Himself, much more should His servants and messengers'; see Matt. x. 24; Luke vi. 40; and on ver. 17, Luke xii. 47, 48. The mere recognition of such a duty of humility, is a very much more easy matter than the putting it in practice. 18.] I say it not (viz. the ἵαν ποιῆτε ἀντά) of you all: for there is one who can never be μακάριος. Our Lord repeats His δὲ ἀλλ' οὐχὶ πάντες of ver. 10, and the sad recollection leads to His trouble in spirit, ver. 21. 19.] ἐγὼ οἶδ. The ἐγὼ is emphatic; and the reason of its emphasis is given in ver. 19. Connexion: 'It might be supposed that this treachery has come upon Me unawares; but it is not so: I (for my part) know whom I have selected (viz. the whole twelve; see ch. vi. 70, not only the true ones [Stier], as in ch. xv. 16, said when Judas was not present): but this has been done by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, declared in the Scriptures.' On the citation, see LXX. The words here are given freely, the LXX having μεγάλυνεν ἐπ' ἐμὲ πτερνισμόν. This is another instance of the direct and unhesitating application of the words of the Psalms by our Lord to Himself. τὴν πτ.] congruit hic

20.] See Matt. x. 40. The connexion is very difficult, and variously set down. It has been generally supposed (Euthym., &c.) that the words were to comfort the Apostles for the disgrace of their order by Judas, or in prospect of their future labours. But then would not αν τινα π. have been expressed by υμας? Another view is to refer back to vv. 16, 17, and suppose the connexion to have been broken by the allusion to Judas. But is this likely, in a discourse of our Lord? I rather believe that the saying sets forth the dignity of that office from which Judas was about to fall: q. d. 'not only was he in close intercourse with Me (ver. 18), but invested with an ambassadorship for Me, and in Me, for the Father; and yet he will lift up his heel against Me.' And the consideration of this dignity in all its privileges, as contrasted with the sad announcement just to be made, leads on to the εταράχθη τῷ πν. of the next verse.

21—20.] Contrast of the manifestations of love and hate. See notes on Matt. xxvi. 21—25. Mark xiv. 18—21. Luke xxii. 21—23. 21.] See go on is but the echo of that mysterious appointment by which the sinner in the exercise of his own corrupted will becomes the instrument of the purposes of God. Thus it is not δ, or εἰ τῆ, ωσθῆναι, but δ ωσθῆναι:—that which thou art doing, hast just now fully determined to put in present action, do more quickly—than thou seemest willing:—or perhaps better 'than thou wouldst otherwise have done,' which seems the account to be ordinarily given of this use of the comparative:—reproving his lingering, and his pretending—(Matt. ver. 25)—to share in the general doubt.

28.] Not even John: who knew he was the traitor, but had no idea the deed was so soon to be done (Lücke, De Wette). Stier supposes John to exclude himself in saying οὐδεις τ. ἀναε, and that he knew.

29.] The first supposition agrees with ver. 1,—that it was πρὸς τῆς ἑορτῆς τοῦ πάσχα. Had it been the night of the passover, the next day being hallowed as a sabbath, nothing could have been bought. On the whole question see notes on Matt. xxvi. 17, and ch. xviii. 28. On the second supposition, see ch. xii. 5. The gift to the poor might be, to help them to procure their paschal lamb.

30.] The remark ἦν δὲ νύξ (which certainly concludes this period, see ὄρα οὖν, ver. 12) seems to be added to bring the whole narrative from ch. xiii. 1 to ch. xviii. 3 into precision, as happening on one and the same night. It is perhaps fanciful to see, as Orig., Olah., Stier, &c. have done, an allusion to the σκόρια in Judas's soul, or to ὕμνων . . . ἡ ὥρα καὶ ἡ ἔξουσία τοῦ σκόρου, Luke xxii. 53; though doubtless there the Lord alludes to its being also night: but I quite feel, with Meyer, that there is something awful in this termination—it was night.

not the same. This is the glorifying of God by Christ on earth, in His course of obedience as the Son of Man, which was completed by His death (ὑπήκοος μέχρι θανάτου, Phil. ii. 8). And His death was the transition-point between God being glorified in Him, and He being glorified in God—manifested to be the Son of God with power by His resurrection, and received up to the Father, to sit at the right hand of God. This latter (ver. 32) is spoken of by Him here as future, but immediate (ἰθὺς) on His death, and leads on to the address in ver. 33. ἐν ἑαυτῷ is in God (the Father), not in Christ. εαυτ. reflects back on the subject of the sentence: and ἐν is not 'by means of,' but in, by the resurrection of Him into that glory, which He had indeed before, but now has as the Son of Man, with the risen Manhood; so παρὰ εαυτῷ, ch. xvii. 6. Grotius compares 1 Sam. ii. 30 (τοὺς δοξάζοντάς με δοξάσω LXX). ἀντιδραμεῖται αὐτῷ ὁ πατήρ τὸ μῖζον οὐ ὁ φόρος τοῦ ἀνθρώπου πεποιήκειν. Origen. in Joan. tom. xxxii. 18, vol. iv. p. 451.

33.] τεκνία—here only used by Christ—affectingly expresses His not only brotherly, but fatherly love (Isa. ix. 6) for His own, and at the same time their immature and weak state, now about to be left without Him. καθὼς εἶπν.] 'No-luit discipulis citius hoc dicere: infidelibus dixit citius.' Bengel. But naturally the two clauses, 'Ye shall seek Me and not find Me, and shall die in your sins,' also spoken to the Jews (ch. vii. 33; viii. 21), are here omitted: and by this omission the connexion with ver. 34 is supplied;—'Ye shall be left here: but, unlike the Jews, ye shall seek Me and shall find Me, and the way is that of Love,—to Me, and to one another (so Stier, v. 140 ff. edn. 2)—forming (ver. 35) an united Body, the Church, in which all shall recognize My presence among you as My disciples.'

34.] The καινότης of this commandment consists in its simplicity and (so to speak) intimacy. The same kind of love was prescribed in the O. T. (see Rom. xiii. 8):—'as thyself' is the highest measure of love, and it is therefore not in degree that the new commandment differs (Cyr., Euthym., Theod. Mops.) from the old, nor in extent, but in being the commandment of the new covenant,—the first-fruit of the Spirit in the new dispensation (Gal. v. 22); see 1 John ii. 7, 8 (and note), where καινή is commented on by the Apostle himself.

I cannot agree with Stier (v. 148, edn. 2), that ἐν in the second sentence is not || with ἵνα in the first, but signifies ('I have loved you') 'in order that &c.' The sentence is analogous to ver. 14, and the new point in it is the καθὼς ἡγ. ὑμ., which is therefore set first, and should be (as in E. V.) retained so.

35.] πάντες,—all the world,—and the object is to be, not mere vain praise or display before the world, but that men may be attracted by the exhibition of the Spirit of Christ, and won over to Him. The world, notwithstanding this proof of His presence among them, shall hate them: see 1 John iii. 10—15. But among πάντες they themselves are also included—brotherly

38.] The 3^{da} τί is not answered—but Peter's boast solemnly questioned. See a somewhat similar question, ch. i. 51. There was at the same time a startling inversion of the subsequent facts, in this boast; to which our Lord, I think, alludes in His question,—τ. ψ. σου ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ θήσεις; The οὐ μὴ ἀλέκ. φων. necessarily implies, as it was night, ἐν τῇ νυκτὶ ταύτῃ,—and binds the whole events of this chapter to ch. xviii. CHAP. XIV. 1—31.] This first division of the great discourse (see above on ch. xiii. 31) is spent in more directly comforting the disciples for their Lord's departure, by the assurance of His

of spiritual things. The οἰκία is Heaven: Pa. xxxiii. 13, 14; Isa. lxiii. 15. In it are many (in number—not in degree of dignity, as Clem. Alex., Basil., Theod., Chrys., Theophylact, Tert., Hil., Aug., &c., at least no such meaning is here conveyed) abiding-places; room enough for them all;—ἱκαναὶ διέσθαι καὶ ὑμᾶς συνισσμένους ἡμῖν αἰ. Euthym. If not,—if they could not follow Him thither, He would not have concealed this from them. This latter assurance is one calculated to beget entire trust and confidence; He would not in any matter hold out vain hopes to them;—His word to them would plainly state all difficulties and discouragements,—as indeed He does, ch. xv. 18; xvi. 1, 4; which last verse ἵνα μνημ. . . . ὅτι ἐγὼ εἶπον ὑμῖν, is decisive for the above interpretation here, against those who would join ὅτι πορεύομαι . . . with εἶπον ἂν ὑμῖν (Euthym., Aug., Erasm., Luther, Bengel):—which besides does violence to the next verse, where the 'going to prepare a place' is stated as a fact. The ὅτι may, it is true, have been inserted as a ὅτι recitantis, to favour the view just controverted: but it is much more probably genuine, signifying because, and belongs to the whole sense of vv. 1, 2, as a reason why their heart should not be troubled.

The sense confidently proposed for the many mansions by a correspondent,—that He was going to one part of His Father's house, while they would remain in another, that house being not Heaven, but the Universe,—is entirely put out of the question, as being frigid in the extreme under the solemn circumstances,—as being contrary to all Scripture analogy of expression,—and as inconsistent with the πορεύομαι ετοιμασαι τόπον ὑμῖν, where the τόπος is of necessity correlative with the μοναί, which are in that οἰκία whither He is going. Besides, their earthly μικρὸς χρόνος could in no sense be called a μονή. The ετοιμασαι τόπον is that of which we sing,—'When Thou hadst overcome the sharpness of death, Thou didst open the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers': see note on Luke xxiii. 43. And thus it is τόπος, not ῥῥος μονάς:—the place as a whole, not each man's place in it.

3.] On ἵαν (not 'when,' here or any where), see note, ch. xii. 32. Here there is no translation of feeling: only in the extract from Hermann there, we may read 'experientiā (vestrā) cognoscetur.'

In order to understand this, we must bear in mind what Stier well calls the 'perspective' of prophecy. The coming again of the Lord is not one single act,—as His resurrection, or the descent of the Spirit, or His second personal advent, or the final coming to judgment; but the great complex of all these, the result of which shall be, His taking His people to Himself to be where He is. This ἔρχομαι is begun (ver. 18) in His Resurrection—carried on (ver. 23) in the spiritual life (see also ch. xvi. 22 ff.), the making them ready for the place prepared;—further advanced when each by death is fetched away to be with Him (Phil. i. 23); fully completed at His coming in glory, when they shall for ever be with Him (1 Thess. iv. 17) in the perfected resurrection state.

4.] And where (whither) I go ye know the way. They might have known, and doubtless did know in some sense; but, as Lampe remarks, 'interdum quis laudatur ut officii sui moneatur.' We use thus 'you know,'—leaving to be supplied, 'if you would give the matter thought.'

It is another side of the same idea of the Way;—God being true, and only approached by and in truth. The henceforth is the first time, beginning with our Lord's glorification, which was now at hand. Lücke marks: 'ἀπ' ἄρτι' is not entirely future nor entirely present, but the moment of transition, the identification of the present and future. Christ speaks here leaptically, in reference to the hour of glorification being come' (ii. 596). ⁸.] Philip misunderstands ὥρα, to see 'seeing is a vision,'—and intimates one such sight of God would set at all their fears, and give them perfect confidence. ⁹.] The Son is the only Son of the Father to men: see ch. 44, 45; Col. i. 15; Heb. i. 3; 1 Tim. vi. 1. placed in one member and works in the other; and, as there, ἔργα and ῥήματα are taken as correlative and co-extensive;—all the working of the Lord Jesus being a λαλιά, a revelation of the Father. De Wette supposes both ἔργα and ῥήμ. to be understood in both places. Without the [ὁ], the sense will be, of course, the Father, abiding in Me ποι. τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ] doeth His works: they are not Mine, but His, done in and by Me: but ἐν ἐμοί, present and abiding, so that ὁ ἱσχυρὸς ἐμὲ ἱσχυρεῖν τὸν πατέρα.

11—24.] Jesus will make proof of His abiding union with the Father, in His union with His own: and this, vv. 12—14, in answering prayer: vv. 15—17, in the sending of the Spirit: vv. 18 ff., as a pledge of the completion of this union in His personal return. The Lord now unfolds out of this ποιῶ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ, the great promise of the Paraclete. δὲ τ. ἔργα αὐτῶ See ch. x. 38. The object here seems to be, to fix their attention on the works as a plain testimony even to such as could not simply believe so deep a thing on His assertion (πιστ. μοι), and one which ——— 12.] should become subjective in themselves hereafter,—by virtue of their living union with Him who is gone to the Father, and become the dispenser and channel of the Spirit. ‘Qui Christo de se loquenti credit, in Christum credit.’ Bengel.

μείζ. τούτων] This word μείζ. is not to be evaded (so as to = πλείονα, Lampe), but taken in its full strict sense. And the keys to its meaning will be found ch. i. 51; v. 20. The works which Jesus did, His Apostles also did,—scil., raising the dead, &c.;—greater works than those, they did,—not in degree, but in kind: spiritual works, under the dispensation of the Spirit, which had not yet come in. But they did them, not as separate from Him: but in Him, and by Him; and so (ch. v. 21) He is said to do them. The work which He did by Peter’s sermon, Acts ii., was one of these μείζονα ῥούτων,—the first-fruits of the unspeakable gift.

This union of them with and in Him is expressed here by τὰ ἔργ. ἃ ἐγὼ ποιῶ, κακείνος ποιήσει. ‘He has sown, we reap; and the harvest is greater than the seed-time.’ Stier, v. 189, edn. 2.

13.] I have retained the period after πορεύομαι (Gröt., Griesb., Lachm., Knapp, Lücke, Meyer, Stier place a comma only and connect this verse with the δεῖν), because the sense remains much the same, and the style is better preserved.

αἰτήσητε, scil. τὸν πατέρα: so ch. xv. 16; xvi. 23. But this does not exclude, but distinctly includes, prayer to Christ; so blended are these two (as the ὁρᾶν, ver. 9), that we have not ποιήσει, but ποιήσω, and, ver. 14, emphatically ἐγὼ ποιήσω.

He who prays to the Father, prays to the Son. This ποιῶ answers to the ποιήσαι in ver. 12; the reason why you shall do these greater works, is, on account of the all-powerful Spirit of grace and supplication which my going to the Father shall bring down upon the Church; in answer to which Spirit, I will do by you whatever in my Name (i. e. in union with Me, as being Mine, manifesting forth Jesus as the Son of God) ye shall ask. And the end of this is, that by these μαζον τούτων, the wonders of grace and triumphs of the Spirit, the Father may be glorified (His glory shewn forth) in and by the Son. 14.] solemnly repeats as a promise, what was incidentally asserted before: 'For this is a truth, that whatever' &c. And besides, adds the ἐγὼ: it is I that will do it: shewing that the use of the first person before was emphatic. 'ἐγὼ hoc jam indicat gloriam,'—Bengel.

15.] is a following out of ἐν τῷ διόμαρι μου: 'That way of prayer is the way of loving obedience, in which the Spirit is ever found, and which is only trodden by His help:'—and also of ἵνα δοξ. ὁ π. ἐν τ. vi., 'As the Father is honoured in the Son, so must the Son be honoured in you:'—see ch. xv. 10.

16.] And then the Spirit shall proceed forth upon you. Not αἰρήσω, but ἐρωτήσω—'familiaris petendi modus,' Bengel:—rather perhaps, a manner of asking implying actual presence and nearness,—and here used of the mediatorial office in Christ's ascended state. παράκλητον] Olshausen remarks that the interpretations of this word range themselves in two classes, which again by no means exclude one another:—those of 'COM-FORTER,' and those of 'ADVO [Teacher' (Theodore of Mopsuest Ernesti) is out of the question.] etymology of the word requires the as its strict meaning, and in this meaning it satisfies 1 John ii. 1, κλητον ἔχομεν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα Ἰησοῦν: but not so all the places where it is used of the Holy Spirit,—not verse, where of the Son and Spirit. And therefore the other meaning,—forter, including as it does in its ft (see Rom. viii. 26, where both, the συν λαμβάνεσθαι and the ὑπερεντυχεῖς are united) the Advocate also, has both here and in Germany (3r Luther) sanctioned by Christian use, the most adequate rendering. See deacon Hare's Mission of the Comforter vol. ii. note J a. He shews that W from whom we have our Comforter, used 'comfort' for the Latin comfortus as e. g. Luke xxii. 43; Acts ix. 1. Thus the idea of help and strength is veiled by it, as well as of consolation. It was this office [comfortari] which I had filled to His disciples while with Him—and which the Holy Spirit was to even more abundantly (and in a higher sense, because their state would be higher on the removal of Jesus from them. 17.] τὸ π. τ. ἀλ., not 'the true Spirit' but 'THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH;'—the ἔ. here, as being separated from it by οὐδὲ: 'recognizes not in His operations (obj.) nor knows (subj.):'—has neither sight nor knowledge of. γινώσκετε] present, but spoken of their state as disciples opposed to the world,—and proleptically, as before. They were even now not of the world (ch. xv. 19), and are therefore viewed in the completion of their state as opposed to it.

μένει (not μενεί as vulg. and some other vss.) is rightly explained by De Wette to be future in signification, as any present predication of permanence must necessarily be; abideth, as μῖνει, ch. viii. 35. Euthym. understands παρ' ὑμ. μῖνει of the Spirit abiding in Jesus, Who was among them: but wrongly.

[ἐστίν] This was perhaps corrected to the future, because, though their knowledge of the Spirit proper to their complete state, and His dwelling, remaining, among them, had in some inferior sense begun,—His dwelling in them had not. See Hare, Mission of the Comforter, ii. note I. With the reading ἐστίν, the prolepsis is still stronger.

18.] ὀρφ. should be orphans, as in the E. V. marg. The office of the παράκλη. is to connect the disciples with the Father: if therefore they had Him not, they would be fatherless. The expression connects with revivia ch. xiii. 33, and as Euthym., springs from πατρικὴ ἐνσπλάγχνυα. This makes ἐρχομαι, I am coming, plain, as applying to the coming by the Spirit, who is one with Christ:—not only the ultimate personal coming, which is but the last step of the ἐρχομαι, nor only the bodily coming again to them and not to the world at the Resurrection, which was but a pledge of His lasting presence in the Spirit: see on ver. 3. ἐρχομαι is (as there) the complex of these

—the great Revisitation, in all its blessed progress. The absence of any connecting particle as γάρ, with ἐρχομαι, arises (Meyer) from the depth of affection in the Lord's heart.

19—21.] This ἐρχομαι is explained to consist in His presence among them by the life of His Resurrection, which is theirs; by (ver. 20) the witness of the Spirit in their hearts; and (ver. 21) their sanctification by the Spirit in love, and the consequent manifestation of Jesus to them.

Luthardt (ii. p. 309 f.) attempts to confine ἐρχομαι (and this whole passage) to the παρουσία, in spite of the plain sense of vv. 19, 20, relying on the analogy of Rev. xxii. 17, and saying that on the common interpretation, the Church would have no cause to long for her Lord: and so Aug., Maldon., Hofm., al. But manifestly the context is against him: and he must thus explain away many other passages (e.g. Matt. xviii. 20). The presence of Christ by the Spirit is none the less real, for being incomplete.

19.] The immediate reference of this θεωρεῖς is to the forty days (see Acts x. 41)—but only as leading on to its wider and deeper reference to the spiritual life.

20.] ζῶ, not ζήσω—the principle of Life being immanent in Him.

21.] ἐγὼ, in all its fullness, including the most blessed sense of ζωή,—the Life of the Spirit,—here and hereafter. See Meyer's note.

20.] ἐκ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, no particular day: but 'each of these periods, as its continually increasing light breaks upon you, shall bring increased knowledge of your unity in Me with the Father, and my dwelling in you by the Spirit.' If any particular day is to be thought of, it would naturally be the Pentecost.

Aug. in loc. Or perhaps more accurately (with Stier), 'He who has my commandments, as being my disciple by outward profession (not thus only: but holds them, by the inner possession of a living faith. So Meyer), and keeps them:' see Luke xi. 28. And τηρ. is more of the inner will to keep them, than the absolute observance, which can only follow on high degrees of spiritual advancement.

ἐμφ. αὐτ. ἐμ. by the Holy Spirit: see ch. xvi. 14. This (as Stier observes) is the highest promise which can be made to man (see ver. 23), and yet it is made to every man who ἔχει κ. τηρεῖ the commandments of the Lord Jesus. Cf. EXOD. in ref.

22.] Ἰούδας, οὐχ ὁ Ἰσκ. = Ἰούδας Ἰσκάβου of Luke vi. 16: see note on Matt. x. 3. Meyer remarks that the οὐχ ὁ Ἰσκαριώτης is pragmatically superfluous, after ch. xiii. 30, but is added by St. John from his deep horror of the Traitor who bore the same name. The question seems to be put with the Jewish idea, that the Messiah, the King and Judge of the nations, must necessarily manifest himself to the world.

[καὶ preceding an interrogation, expresses astonishment at what has just been said, and, assuming it, connects to it a conclusion which appears to refute or cast doubt on it. So Eur. Med. 1388 —ὦ τίςνα φίλτατα! "μητρί γε, σοὶ δ' οὐ. κάκειν' ἔτασ; See more examples in Hai tung, i. p. 146, and cf. Kühner on Xer Mem. p. 117.] τί γέγ. ἐστ. "Th addition πρὸς αὐτὸν ἔλ. κ. μονήν παρ' αὐτῷ ποσ. makes this incapacity still plainer and more deeply felt." Meyer For (καὶ, and hence you may infer what am setting forth) the word which ye has (and which the world οὐ τηρεῖ = ἀθετεῖ, —is not Mine, but the Father's (not 'non tam . . . quam'). διδάξει and ὑπομνήσει. Meyer supposes that a pause took place here, and the Lord looks back on what He had said to them. But this does not seem so natural.

^{26.}] q. d. 'I know that ye do not understand them yet: but' &c. τὸ πν. τὸ ἅγ.] The Paraclete is now more closely defined by this well-known Name,—and, by δ πέμψῃ ὁ πατήρ, and ἐκεῖνος . . . designated personally, as One sent, and One acting on them. ἐν τῷ ὀν. μου] not, 'in My stead,' but in regard of Me—'in answer to My prayer, and prayers in My name,—to those who bear My name,—and as a means of manifesting Me.'

^{28.} εἰπάτε πάντα stands by itself, not with δ ἵκον:—shall teach you all things;—'all that can and may be learnt by you, all that belongs to your work and life in Me.' ὑπομνήσει] What is not understood is liable to be forgotten;—and therefore in this word is implied the giving them a right understanding of, as well as recalling, what Jesus had said to them: see ch. ii. 22; xii. 16.

It is on the fulfilment of this promise to the Apostles, that their sufficiency as Witnesses of all that the Lord did and taught, and consequently THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE GOSPEL NARRATIVE, is grounded. ^{27.}] This is introduced by ver. 25, which suggests the speedy close of the discourse. It was customary to take leave with wishes of peace:—so 1 Sam. i. 17; Luke vii. 50; Acts xvi. 36; 1 Pet. v. 14; 3 John 15. Also, to reassure by such words, see Gen. xliii. 23; Judg. vi. 23. But our Lord distinguishes His peace, true peace, 'the peace which I have and give'

(see ch. xv. 11), from the mere empty word used in the world's form of greeting. Peace (in general) He leaves with them;—His peace He gives to them, over and above that other. The καθὼς ὁ κ. διδ. must refer, I think (with Lampe, Lücke, and Stier), to the world's manner of giving,—not to the unreality of the world's peace, of which, however true, there is no direct mention here. The world can only give peace in empty formulae, saying 'Peace, peace,' when there is no peace: Jer. vi. 14 al.

^{28.}] as far as ὑμᾶς is a reason why their heart should not be troubled;—then the rest of the verse removes all ground of δειλία, since it is an exaltation of Him whom they loved, which is about to happen; and therefore a ground of joy, and not of fear.

μείζων] And therefore the going of Jesus to the Father is an advancement. This word greater, as Luther well remarks (Stier, v. 228, edn. 2), is not here used as referring to the Nature or Essence of the Son as related to the Father,—but as indicating that particular subordination to the Father in which the Lord Jesus then was,—and the cessation of the state of humiliation, and entering into His glory, which would take place on His being received up to the Father. So also Calvin: 'Non confert hic Christus Patris Divinitatem cum sua, nec humanam suam naturam divinæ Patris essentiae comparat, sed potius statum præsentem celestis glorie ad quam mox recipiendus erat.' And Cocceius: 'non intelligitur hic minoritas secundum naturam humanam,—quia intelligitur minoritas quæ per perfectionem ad Patrem deponitur' (Stier, ibid. Similarly, De Wette,

The whole doctrinal controversy which has been raised on these words (especially by the Fathers against the Arians, see Suicer, Thea. ii. pp. 1368, 9), seems not to belong to the sense of the passage. That there is a sense in which the Father is greater than even the glorified Son, is beyond doubt (see especially 1 Cor. xv. 27 f.); but as on the one hand that concession is no concession to Arianism, because it is not in the essential being of the Son, but in His Mediatorial office that this minoritas consists, —so on the other hand this verse implies in itself no such minoritas, the discourse being of another kind. 29.] εἶρηκα—viz. The construction is elliptic: sup. 'But (his power over me for death be permitted by Me) that,' &c. And a period at ποῦ, as usually done. Meyer, al., and Luthardt, would carry the sense from ποῦ, 'But that the we may know that I love the Father, and the Father commanded me, thus I arise, let us go hence.' I need only pu to the inner feeling of any who have lear to appreciate the majesty and calmnes our Lord's discourses, whether a sent so savouring of theatrical effect is lil to have been spoken by Him. We notwithstanding safely believe that the εἰ. ἰν., without this connexion, does doubtedly express the holy boldness of Lord in going to meet that which wa come upon Him, and is for that reason serted by St. John.

ἐγείρ., εἰ. ἐ These words imply a movement from table to depart. Probably the rest of discourse, and the prayer, ch. xvii., delivered when now all were stand ready to depart. There would be a little pause, in which the preparations departure would be made. But the p is clearly the same, see ch. xviii. 1, τα εἰκῶν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐξῆλθεν:—besides wh we can hardly suppose (Grot., &c.) courses of a character like those in ch. xvi. to have been delivered to as man eleven persons, while walking by the

and in a time of such publicity as that of the Paschal Feast. Still less is the supposition of Bengel and Beausobre probable,—that ch. xiii. xiv. happened outside the city, and that between ch. xiv. and xv. the paschal meal takes place. Compare also ch. xiii. 30, which is decisive against this idea.

CHAP. XV. 1—27.] Injunction to vital union in love with Jesus and one another.

1—11.] Their relation to Him. Various suggestive circumstances have been imagined, but none of them are satisfactory. The vineyards on the way to Gethsemane (Lampe),—the carved vine on the great doors of the temple (Rosenmüller, bibl. exeget. Repert. i. 166 [Lücke],—see Joseph. B. J. v. 5. 4; Antt. xv. 11. 3); a vine trained about the window of the guest-chamber (Knapp, Lücke conj., Tholuck, 6), are all fanciful, and the two first (see on ch. xiv. 31) inapplicable. The cup, so lately partaken (Mey., Stier), is certainly nearer,—see below. But I believe with Lücke that most probably the Lord did not take the similitude from any outward suggesting occasion, but as a means of illustrating the great subject, the inner unity of Himself and His. Occasion enough was furnished, by the O. T. symbolism of the vineyard and the vine,—Isa. v. 1 ff.; Jer. ii. 21; Ezek. xix. 10 ff., and especially Ps. lxxx. 8—19: by the intimate analogy of vegetable life (of which the tree bearing fruit is the highest kind, and of such trees the vine the noblest) with spiritual, and perhaps also by the γίνωγμα τῆς ἀμψ. having been so recently the subject of their attention and the Lord's prophecy, Luke xxii. 18 ||.

1.] The Vine and branches stand in a much nearer connexion than the Shepherd and the sheep, or the lord of the vineyard and the vines; and answer to the Head and members in Eph. v. 23, 30; Col. ii. 19, linked together by a common organization, and informed by one and the same life. ἡ ἀληθινή] not only, 'by which prophecy is fulfilled:' not only, 'in which the organism and qualities of the vine are most nobly realized' (Tholuck), but as in ch. i. 9, true, i. e. original, archetypal. The material creations of God are only inferior examples of that finer spiritual life and organism in which the creature is raised up to partake of the divine nature; only ἀντίτυπα τῶν ἀληθινῶν, Heb. ix. 24; ὑποδείγματα τῶν ἐν τοῖς οὐρ., ib. 23; see ch. vi. 32. ὁ γεωργός] Not only the tiller of the land, but the vine planter and dresser; He who has originated the relation between the vine and branches by planting the Vine in this earth (the nature of man), and who looks for and ensures the bringing forth of fruit. 2.]

The Vine contains fruitful, and unfruitful branches. Who are these unfruitful branches? Who are the branches? Clearly, all those who, adopting the parallel image, are made members of Christ by baptism, Rom. vi. 3, 4; compare σὺμφυτοι, ib. ver. 5, also Rom. xi. 17 ff. The Vine is the visible Church here, of which Christ is the inclusive Head: the Vine contains the branches; hence the unfruitful, as well as the fruitful, are ἐν ἐμοί. Every such unfruitful branch (notice the μή in an hypothesis, not οὐ) the Father αἶρει,—pulls off and casts away: and every one that beareth fruit He καθαίρει (an allusion to αἶρει, but only in the Greek [?]): "suavis rhythmus," Bengel), prunes, by cleansing it of its worthless parts, and shortening its rank growth, that it may ripen and enlarge its fruit better. Cf. Aesch. in Ctes. (iii. 166, quoting Demosthenes), ἀμπελοργουσί τινες τὴν πόλιν, ἀνατεμῆκασι τινες τὰ κλήματα τοῦ δήμου. The two, τῶν κλ., καὶ τῶν

...., are pendant nominatives, a construction usual with John in connexion with πᾶν, see ch. vi. 39; xvii. 2. 3.] καθαροί, see ch. xiii. 10. In Eph. v. 26, we have both the washing διὰ τὸν λόγον, and the word (ἐν ῥήματι), united. The word of Christ dwelling in them by Faith

(see ver. 7) is the purifying principle (ch. xvii. 17). But the καθαροὶ here is not = εκαθαριμένοι, pruned, in the sense of ver. 2. The ἡδη limits it to their present capacities and standing. There was more pruning at hand, when the sap should begin to flow,—when the Spirit should be shed abroad; and this future handling of the γιωργός is indicated by μεναι ἐν ἐμοὶ . . . 4.] καγῶ ἐν ὑμ. must not (with Euthym., Meyer, and Lücke) be taken as a promise, which (see on ἐν ἐμοὶ above) would be contrary to the sense: but (with Aug., Tholuck, Bengel, Stier, who however modifies it by rendering ‘so abide in Me that I may abide in you’) as a clause dependent on μεναι ἐν ἐμοὶ, ‘Take care that ye abide in Me and I in you’ both these being necessary to the bringing forth fruit: see ver. 5, where the two are similarly bound together.

Here the natural strictness of the similitude is departed from. The branch cannot sever itself from the vine: but, such a case supposed, every one will see the inevitable consequence. Bengel says well, “Hic locus egregie declarat discrimen naturæ et gratiæ.” It is the permitted free-will of the creature which makes the difference between the branches in the two cases.

5.] The interpretation of the allegory which each mind was forming for itself, the Lord solemnly asserts for them. Notice οὗτος—he and no other: “it is he, that . . .” χωρὶς ἐμ. is more than ‘without Me,’ it = χωρισθῆναι ἀπ’ ἐμοῦ (Mey.), separate from Me, from being in Me and I in you. The ὅτι ῥη what is implied in χωρὶς ἐμ. οὐ δ. π. rather than the words themselves: union with Me (μεναι ἐν ἐμοὶ) is the efficient cause of fruit being produced having no power to do any thing ποιεῖν καρπόν: for φέρειν is here throughout), to bring any thing to fection, to do any of the ἔργα of which ye are, separate from Me.

This verse is a most important text against supra-lapsarian error, shewing that falling from grace is possible, pointing out the steps of the fall. serve this is not said of the unfro branch, which the Father takes away judgment): but of one who will not in Christ, becomes separate from I (1) is cast out (of the vineyard, or of Vine) like a (τὸ κλ. scil. τὸ ἀχρημ. misled to those who abide in Christ and have His word (Heb. vi. 5) abiding in them. αἰτήσασθε is the imperative used proleptically of the future time. This not having been seen, it has probably been altered to αἰτήσαισθε: see ch. xiv. 13. 8 εἰάν θέλητε, in the supposed case, is necessarily in the way of God's will, and as tending to πολλὸν καρπὸν φέρειν. 9.] ἐν τούτῳ belongs to the following, not the preceding: ἐν τούτῳ, ἵνα . . . as in E. V., see reff. ἔδοξάσθῃ again is proleptic, representing that in the spiritual dispensation the fact is habitually so. See on this sense of the aorist, Winer, edn. 6, § 40. 5. b. 2. The πολλὸς καρπὸς is not merely 'large success in the apostolic mission,' but 'individual advance in bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit.' καὶ γένησθε] and that ye may become My (true) disciples, ἀπαρισθῇ-σθε, Euthym. (reading the future, see below.) 'Fundamentum Christianismi, fieri discipulum Christi: fastigium, esse discipulum Christi.' Bengel. According to the reading γένησθε, the actual result of what precedes is stated: and thus ye shall become . . . 9.] The Love between the Father and Christ is compared with that between Christ and His disciples. The sense is best served by placing a colon (as in E. V.) after ὑμᾶς ἡγάπησα, making μείνατε κ.τ.λ. a separate injunction, and καγὼ = ὁρθως. With only a comma at ἡγάπησα, that which is the great assertion of the sentence, is suffered to slip by unnoticed; viz., that 'As the Father hath loved the Son, so the Son His disciples.' τῇ ἀγ. τῇ ἐμ. may be rendered the love of Me, as in Luke xxii. 19 || 1 Cor.,—but the sense is not good, and the expression is not parallel with τῇ ἀγ. μου in ver. 10; so that I prefer my love, the love which I have towards you; remain in it; do not cast yourselves out of it. The other sense is implied in this, but not expressed. 10.] The way thus to remain is prescribed; even that way of simple obedience to His Will, which He followed to the Will of the Father. On τῇ ἀγάπῃ μου, see above: in the last clause, αὐτοῦ is prescribed, as Meyer well says, to denote the high consciousness of bliss and dignity in abiding in the Father's love. 11.] λελάλ. again proleptic, hastening to the end of the discourse, and treating it as ended. ἡ χ. ἡ ἐμὴ] not 'joy concerning Me' (Euthym.), nor 'joy derived from Me' (De Wette), nor 'My joy over you' (Aug., Lampe, Lücke, former edd.), but My joy, properly speaking (see 2 Cor. ii. 3, οὐκ ἡ ἐμὴ χαρὰ πάντων ὑμῶν ἰστί): "His own holy exultation, the joy of the Son in the consciousness of the love of God, of His Unity with the Father: see ver. 10." (Lücke, 3rd edn.) κ. ἡ χ. ἐμ. πλ.] That their joy might, by the indwelling of that His Joy, be uplifted and ennobled (πληρωθῇ) even to fulness, —to the extreme of their capability and satisfaction,—and might remain so.

12.] That He may shew them that it is no rigid code of keeping commandments in the legal sense, ver. 11 is inserted, and now the commandment (as including all others) is again explained (see ch. xiii. 34) to be, mutual love,—and that, after His example of Love to them.

13.] A difficulty has been unnecessarily found in this verse, because St. Paul, Rom. v. 6 ff., cites it as a nobler instance of love, that Christ died for us when we were enemies. But manifestly here the example is from common life, in which if a man did lay down his life it would naturally be for his friends; and would be, and is cited as, the greatest example of love. Nor again is there any doctrinal difficulty: our Lord does not assert of himself, that He laid down his life only for his friends (as defined in the next verse), but puts forward this side of his Love as a great and a practical example for his followers. His own great Sacrifice of Himself lies in the background of this verse; but only in the background, and with but one side of it seen, viz., his Love to them. See 1 Tim. iv. 10, and compare 1 John iii. 16.

14.] ἵνα, as in ver. 8, depends on αὐτῇ, not on any will implied in ἀγάπη (De Wette), nor used ἐκπαλιῶς (Olsh.),—and answers to 'scilicet, ut:' see on this use of ἵνα, note on 1 Cor. xiv. 13.

14.] parallel to ver. 10,—and, like it, guarded, in vv. 15, 16, 17, from legal misinterpretation.

15.] prophetically spoken, of the state in which He would place them under the Spirit. Nor is there any discrep with ch. xiii. 13, 16, and ver. 20 which are also spoken of their future dition: for in that sense both relations subsist together. It is the lower seu δεῦλος which is brought out in this v. The proleptical character of the saying clearly shewn in the οὐκ οἶδεν τι ποιᾷ εἰς, for this was precisely their condition, but was after His Ascension changed into light and knowledge.

ἐγνώρισα ὑμῖν.] Here again the allusion is to their future (see ch. xvi. 12) to their future under the dispensation of the Spirit: even to the fulness and completion of it as Aug. remarks, Tract. lxxxvi. 1; compare the confession of one of the great Apostles, 1 Cor. xiii. 10. 'Sicut immortalitatem carnis et salutem animæ futuram exspectamus, quamvis jam nunc accepto salvi facti esse dicamur omnium notitiam quæcumque Unigenitus audivit a Patre, futuram sperare dicimus, quamvis hoc jam se fecisse dicat Christus.' Aug. ut supra.

living and developing principle; not the missionary journeys of the Apostles (Grot., Lampe, Meyer). The καρπὸς is not the Church, to be founded by the Apostles, and endure;—this is evident, for here the fruit is spoken of with reference to themselves, and their ripening into the full stature of Christ. Much of their fruit will be necessarily the winning of others to Christ: but that is not the prominent idea here. μένη] See 2 John 8; Rev. xiv.

13. ἵνα ὁ τι ἂν . . .] This ἵνα is parallel with the former one, not the result of it; the two, the bringing forth of fruit and the obtaining answer to prayer, being co-ordinate with each other; but (vv. 7, 8) the bearing fruit to God's glory is of these the greater, being the result and aim of the other. 17.] ταῦτα refers (as almost always in John, see vv. 11, 21; xvi. 1, 25, 33; xvii. 1; xviii. 1 al.) back to what has gone before. 'The object of my enjoining these things on you is (for all since ver. 12 has been an expansion of καθὼς ἤγ. ἔρ.) that ye love one another' (see 1 John iv. 11). Then from the indefiniteness of this word ἀλλήλους our Lord takes occasion to forewarn them that however wide their love to one another, they cannot bring all within this category; there will be ὁ κόσμος, which will hate them.

18—27.] Their relation to the world: and vv. 18—21, ground of the world's hatred. On the connexion, see above. 18.] See ch. vii. 7. γινώσκοντες,

The great proof of this hatred to Him was yet to come, but is viewed as past. This knowledge brings comfort, 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13.

19.] not only explains this hatred, but derives additional comfort from it, as a sign that they were not (any longer) of the world; but chosen out of it by Him, and endowed with a new life from above. In τὸ ἴδιον ἐφίλει, not ὑμᾶς ἰδ., we have the true practice of the world hinted at, and the false character of the world's love, as a mere φιλαντρία, set forth. "Suum dicitur pro eos, atque sic notatur Interesse mundi," Bengel. In this 'loving their own,' the children of this world fall into hating one another.

Meyer remarks the solemnity of κόσμος thus repeated five times. 20.] ch. xiii. 16, but with a different reference: the sense here being, 'Remember the saying, for it is true in this matter also;' see Matt. x. 24, where it is used in the same sense. difficulty has been raised on ἐτήρησαν . . . τηρήσουσιν, and some have wanted to give this word a hostile sense, (as παρατηρεῖν,) quoting Matt. xxvii. 36, and Gen. iii. 15 (which is altogether an exceptional use, the reading being undoubtedly genuine); see also Jer. xx. 13. But in John this cannot be. Nor is irony (Lampe, Stier) in this latter clause at all in keeping with the solemnity of the discourse. The words simply mean (as Thl.), 'the keeping My word and the keeping yours are intimately joined, and when you find the world or any part of the world do the first, you may infer the other.' The issue of si r. λ. μ. ἐτήρ. was to be proved by their rejection and killing of the Lord Jesus.

Beware of rendering as Kuinoel, "If they had kept my word, they would keep yours," which is ungrammatical. The only idiomatic rendering in English is that of the E. V., If they have kept my word they will keep yours. 21.] ἀλλὰ—ἐποίησεν is, not only by external evidence, but also by internal, the right reading. πειροῖν (as Lücke remarks, ii. 643) would imply that the ἄλλοι referred to were contemporaries of our Lord,—or, at all events, that their works still lasted.

ἐπράξασιν does not refer to the works (as Lücke), but to καὶ ἐμὲ καὶ τὸν πατέρα μου, see ch. xiv. 9.

ἄλλα,—but all this not as an accidental thwarting of My word and work among them, but as a matter predicted in Scripture.

ἵνα, with the fullest sense of purpose, as always, and most especially in this formula. Beware of the evasive ecbatic sense.

ἐν τῷ νόμῳ αὐτῶν, see ch. x. 34 and note. To suppose any irony in these words, as De W. does ('they are true followers-out of their law'), is manifestly against the whole spirit of our Lord's reference to the law. It is 'their law,'—"quem assidue terunt et jactant," Bengel,—as condemning them, though their boast and pride.

ὡς δωρεάν] not, 'to no purpose,' as Bengel (vergeblich), but as E. V. without a cause, answering to προφασιν οὐκ ἔχουσιν, ver. 22.

The citation is probably from the Messianic Psalm lix.

²⁶] This assurance carries on the testimony concerning Christ,—which the world should see and hear, and yet reject and hate Him,—even to the end of time, by means of the Spirit of Truth: so that on the one hand this seeing and hating must not be expected to cease as long as the Spirit bears this witness,—and on the other, He, the Spirit of Truth, will never cease to overcome the hating world by this His testimony. ὁ παρὰ π.

See ch. xiv. 16 and note. ὃν ἐγὼ πέμψω] Stier (whose comment on this verse should be consulted) dwells on the accurate division of the clauses here, ὁ παρὰ π. ὃν ἐγὼ πέμψω,—but τὸ πνεῦμα

τ. ἀλ. ὃ παρὰ τ. πατρός ἐκπορεύεται. The first clause he regards as spoken economically, of the Spirit in His office as Paraclete, sent from the Father by the glorified Son (or, by the Father in the Son's name, ch. xiv. 26), and bringing in the dispensation of the Spirit;—the second ontologically, of the essential nature of the Spirit Himself, that He proceeded forth from the Father. (And if from the Father, from the Son also,—see ch. xvi. 15, and those passages where the Spirit is said to be His Spirit, Rom. viii. 9; Gal. iv. 6; Phil. i. 19; 1 Pet. i. 11, also Rev. xxii. 1.) Perhaps however it is better to take the whole economically, as Luthardt has done. Then ὃν ἐγὼ πέμψω παρ. τ. π. is parallel with ὃ παρὰ τοῦ π. ἐκπορεύεται, and the procession from the Father is the sending by the Son. At all events, this passage, as Beza remarks, cannot be alleged either one way or the other in the controversy with the Greek church on the procession of the Holy Spirit. See this done in the interest of the Greek view, by Theodor. Mops. in loc.

ἐκεῖνος, as opposed to the world which hates Christ. On the emphatic use of this pronoun as identifying the chief subject of the sentence, see note, ch. vii. 29.

²⁷] The disciples are not, as some have supposed, here mentioned as witnesses separate from and working with the Holy Spirit. The witness is one and the same; the Spirit will witness in and by them: the ὅραν ἄθῃ ὁ παρ. belongs to the whole; see Luke xxiv. 48, 49, where this is strongly expressed. This verse alludes to the historical witness which the Holy Ghost in the ministers and eye-witnesses of the word, Luke i. 2, should enable them to give,—which forms the human side (καὶ ἄν. 24, 'quin et vos,' Erasmus.) of this great testimony of the Spirit of truth, and on

This He had never before done so plainly, though occasional mention has been made even of the help of the Spirit under such trials, see Matt. x. 19, 20. ^{μεθ' ὑμ.}

[^{ἡμ.}] While the Lord was with them (cf. Matt. ix. 15), the malice of the world was mainly directed against Him,—and they were overlooked: see ch. xviii. 8. In ^{ἡμῶν} we have the proleptical character of the discourse again manifest. ^{δ.}

This is occasioned by the foregoing, but in fact begins the new subject, the condition of the Comforter's coming. ^{καὶ οὕτως.} They had (see ch. xiii. 36; xiv. 5) asked this verbally before: our Lord therefore cites the question here in some other and deeper sense than they had used it there. I believe the meaning to be: 'None of you enquires into the NATURE (ποῦ being emphatic) of My departure, so as to appear anxious to know what advantages are to be derived from it; but (ver. 6) you are all given up to grief on account of what I have said,' 'expavescitis, neque reputatis quo discedam aut in quem finem.' Calvin. ^{6. ἡ λύπη περὶ αὐτοῦ. τ. κ.]}

'Your grief (or abstract, 'grief') has filled, entirely occupied, your heart (not τὰς κ., but singular, as common to all, see Rom. i. 21), to the exclusion of any regard of my object in leaving you.' 'These are the same disciples who afterwards when their risen Lord had ascended to heaven,—without any pang at parting with Him, returned with great joy to Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 52' (Stier). 'Subest huic blandæ increpationi tacita consolatio. Dum enim improbat, quod questionem, quo vaderet, negligant, sibi id optime perspectum esse docet. Dum negligentiam incusat, ad excusationem tamen avertit, quod ea ex tam vehementi affectu tristitiæ oriunda sit.'

Lampe. ^{7.]} ἀλλὰ—refers to the last clause,—notwithstanding, or nevertheless, as E. V.: ἐγὼ, το οὐδεὶς ἐξ ὑμ. κ.τ.λ. I Myself tell you the real state of the case.

^{συμφέρει ὑμ.} implies that the dispensation of the Spirit is a more blessed manifestation of God than was even the bodily presence of the risen Saviour.

Every rendering of this verse ought to keep the distinction between ἀπέλθω and πορευθῶ, which is not sufficiently done in E. V. by 'go away' and 'depart.' Depart and go would be better: the first expressing merely the leaving them, the second, the going up to the Father. The ἐγὼ before ἀπέλθω is again emphatic: 'that I, for my part, should leave you.'

This οὐκ ἐλεύσεται . . . is a convincing proof, if one more were needed, that the gift of the Spirit at and since the day of Pentecost, was and is something TOTALLY DISTINCT from any thing before that time: a new and loftier dispensation. ^{8—11.]} We have here, in a few deep and wonderful words, the work of the Spirit on the world set forth. This work He shall begin ἐλθὼν, scil. πρὸς ὑμᾶς: not, however, merely 'by your means,' but personally: so that it is not the work and witness of the Apostles which is spoken of, except in so far as they are servants of the Holy Spirit, but (ἐκείνος) His own immediate personal working. ^{ἐλέγξει.]} It is difficult to give in one word the deep meaning: 'convince' approaches perhaps the nearest to it, but does not express the double sense of ἐλέγχειν, which is manifestly here intended—of a convincing unto salvation, and a convicting unto condemnation:—'reprove' is far too weak, conveying merely the idea of an objective rebuke, whereas ἐλέγξει reaches into the heart, and works subjectively in both the above-mentioned ways. See the whole question amply discussed in Archdeacon Hare's Mission of the Comforter, vol. ii. note K.

Lücke's comment is valuable: 'The testimony of the Holy Ghost in behalf of Christ as opposed to the unbelieving world (ch. xv. 26) is essentially a refutation, ἔλεγχος, a demonstration of its wrong and error. All the apostolic preaching, as addressed to the world, takes necessarily this polemical form (1 Tim. v. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 2; iii. 16; Titus i. 9, 13; ii. 15). And the more difficult was the disciples' conflict against the power of this world with only the Word for their weapon, the more comfort was it for them, that the power of God the Spirit working by this ἔλεγχος was their help. In Matt. x. 19, 20; Luke xii. 11, 12, the apologetic side of their conflict, which was in close connexion with the polemical, is brought into view. In ἐλέγχω is always implied the refutation, the overcoming of an error, a wrong,—by the truth and the right. And when, by means of the ἔλεγχος, the truth detects the error, and the right the wrong, so that a man becomes conscious of them,—then arises the feeling of guilt, which is ever painful. Thus every ἐλέγχος is a chastening, a punishment. And hence this office has been called the Estrafamt (punitive office) of the Spirit. The effect of the ἐλέγχος of the divine Spirit in the world may be to harden: but its aim is the deliverance of the world. ὁ κόσμος, in John, includes those who are not yet delivered (from the power of Satan to God), who may be yet delivered,—not the condemned. If the ἐλέγχος of the world is a moral process, its result may just as well be conversion, as non-conversion. Only thus did the ἐλέγχος of the Spirit answer the end of Christ's coming;—only thus could it be a cheering support to the Apostles. Certainly, the ἐπίτις with which the ἐλέγχος closes is condemnation, not however of the world, but of the Prince of the world' (ii. 649 f.).

De Wette denies the salutary side of this ἐλέγχω—but he is certainly wrong: see below.

These three words, ἁμαρτία, δικαιοσύνη, κρίσις, comprehend the three great steps of advance in spiritual truth among men. Of itself the world does not know what Sin is, what Righteousness is, what Judgment is. Nor can either of these be revealed to any man except by the Spirit of God working within him. Each man's conscience has some glimmering of light on each of these; some consciousness of guilt, some sense of right, some power of judgment of what is transitory and weak: but all these are unreal and impractical, till the ἐλέγχος of the Spirit wrought in him (see Stier, v. 306, edn 9.)

And the great opening of to the world is to shew them that its essence is, unbelief in Christ as Son of God. UNBELIEF:—for, man being alien from God by nature, the step towards their recovery must be to hold on that only safety which He has provided for them; and that laying hold faith, and the not doing it, when revealed and placed before them, is sin. Before it was also unbelief;—'The fool hath in his heart, There is no God.'—but—for we can only believe as God revealed Himself,—it is unbelief in Christ the Son of God,—the ὁ θεὸς ἔρχεται πρὸς μί: see this pointedly asserted John v. 10—12. Remember, this belief is not a mere want of historical faith,—but unbelief in its very root,—want of a personal and living recognition of Jesus as the Lord (1 Cor. xii. 3), wherever the Spirit has 'opened His commission' by the planting of the vine Church, is the condemning sin of the world. Of this He shall convince those who are brought out of the world, ultimately convict those who remain in it and die in their sins (see Hare, Mission of the Comforter, vol. ii. note Q).

10.] δικαιοσύνη cannot be only the righteousness of Christ, the mere conviction which would only bring condemnation that world which rejected and crucified Him: but, as Stier remarks rightly 312, edn. 2), τοῦ κόσμου must be supplied after each of the three ἁμαρτία, δικαιοσύνη, κρίσις:—the conviction being sin that is theirs, a righteousness that (or, in the case of condemnation, might have been) theirs, a judgment which theirs (see below). Then, what is the world's righteousness? Not their own, but that of the accepted Man Christ Jesus standing at the right hand of God (seen by us no more, but by that very withdrawal testified to be the Son of God, THE RIGHTEOUS ONE), manifested in the hearts of men by the Spirit to be their only righteousness;—and thereby that righteousness, which they had of their own before, is demonstrated to be worthless and as filthy rags. It is the ὑπάγειν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα by which this righteousness is assured to us, and by the effect of which, the Spirit, the conviction respecting it is wrought in our hearts (see Hare, as above, note T). The condemnatory side of this part of the ἰσχυρος is,—that remorse, wherewith they whose day of grace is past shall look on the perfect righteousness which might have been theirs, and on the miserable substitute with which they contented themselves. II.] As δικαιοσύνη was the world's righteousness, and the ἰσχυρος of it was the manifesting to them how worthless it (their δικαιοσύνη after its old conception) was of their own by nature, but how perfect and complete it (the same as now newly and more worthily apprehended) is in and by Christ,—so now κρίσις is the world's judgment:—on the one side, their judgment or estimate, or discrimination of things,—on the other side, God's judgment, to which it is opposed. This judgment by nature they form in subjection to the prince of this world, the Devil, of whose power they are not conscious, and whose existence they even deny: but the Spirit of God ἰλέγει, shall convict this judgment of wrong;—shall shew them how erroneous and destructive it is, and what a bondage they have been under;—shall detect to them the Prince of this world reigning in the children of disobedience, and give them a better judgment, by which they shall 'not be ignorant of his devices' (2 Cor. ii. 11). But this better judgment itself is that very truth of God manifested in the Lord Jesus, by which (ch. xii. 31) the Prince of this world is cast out;—by which the follower of Christ is enabled to say, 'Get thee behind me, Satan'; by which the unbelieving world, and its Prince, are finally condemned in the judgment hereafter (see Hare, as above, note V).

I have preferred giving pointedly what I believe to be the sense of this most important passage, to stringing together a multitude of opinions on it: seeing that of even the best Commentators no two bring out exactly the same shade of meaning, and thus classification is next to impossible. I sincerely recommend the student to read the notes in Archdeacon Hare's work, where he will find the whole literature of the subject, with the exception of Stier's second edition, and Luthardt's commentary, which have been published since.

It will be seen that in my view the subjective and objective bearing of the three words are both to be kept in sight, and that the great convictive work of the Spirit is to bring man OUT OF HIMSELF INTO CHRIST, Who (in His objective manifestation) must be made unto him (subjectively), 1. ἀπολύτρωσις, 2. δικαιοσύνη, 3. σοφία (the fourth, ἀγιασμός, not being here treated of, as being another part of the Spirit's work, and on those who are no longer the κόσμος, see ch. xvii. 16, 17); and to condemn those who remain in the world finally, in all these points, as having rejected Christ. And this convictive work of the Spirit is a complex and progressive work; including the ministry of the Apostles, and every step taken towards divine truth in the history of the Church, as well as the conversion are the things belonging to πᾶσα ἡ ἀλήθεια

in the next verse, which were gradually unfolded after the Ascension, by the Spirit.

13.] ἅκεις, emphatical, as in ver. 8:

all the truth, viz. on those points alluded to in ver. 12. Lücke observes that the rec.
reading connects πᾶσαν more with δὲ ἡγ-ου, the other with ἀλήθ. The Lord had ever told them the truth, and nothing but the truth, in spiritual things,—but not yet the whole truth, because they could not bear it. This the Spirit should lead them into, open the way to it, and unfold it by degrees. No promise of universal knowledge, nor of infallibility, is hereby conveyed; but a promise to them and us, that the Holy Spirit shall teach and lead us, not as children, under the tutors and governors of legal and imperfect knowledge, but as sons (Gal. iv. 6), making known to us the whole truth of God.

This was in an especial manner fulfilled to them, as set to be the founders and teachers of the Churches. ὁὐ γὰρ ἡ ἀφ' ἑαυ.]

The Spirit does not, any more than the Son, work or speak of Himself: both are sent, the one from the Father, the other from the Father and Son: the one to testify ὅσα ἀκούσει of the Father, the other of the Father and the Son.

ὅσα ἄκ.] from God, the Father and the Son. τὰ ἐρχ. ἀναγ. ὑμ.]

As the direct fulfilment to the Apostles of the leading into the whole truth was the unfolding before them those truths which they have delivered down to us in their Epistles,—so, though scattered traces of the fulfilment of this part of the promise are found in the Acts and those Epistles, its complete fulfilment was the giving of the Apocalypse, in which τὰ ἐρχόμενα are distinctly the subject of the Spirit's revelation, and with which His direct testimony closes: see Rev. i. 1; xii. 6, 20. On the whole of this verse, see Eph. iv. 7.

14.] Notice the emphatic ἐμὲ fixed to the verb. This is in conwith ver. 12—and sets forth the Spirit guiding into truth is in the Son declaring the truth, for He shall forth the glory of Christ, by revealing matters of Christ,—the riches of Father's love in him (ver. 15). "Eco-trium testium: patrem glorificat filium Spiritus sanctus." Bengel.

This verse is decisive against all ad-
and pretended revelations subseque and besides Christ; it being the w
the Spirit to testify to and declare THINGS OF CHRIST; not any thing and beyond Him. And this declar coincident with inward advance i likeness and image of Christ (2 Co 17, 18), not with a mere external dement.

15.] Here we have us a glimpse into the essential relati
the Blessed Trinity. The Father given the Son to have life and all t in Himself (Col. i. 19; ii. 2, 3), the tion being, that the Son glorifies Himself but the Father, by revealin
Father, whom He alone knows (Ma 27). And this Revelation, the Reve of the Father by Christ—is carried the blessed Spirit in the hearts of t ciples of Christ; Who takes (λαμ) indefinite, of the office of the Spirit) things of Christ, and declares, proclaim them. διὰ τοῦτο]

There (rightly) said . . . i. e. 'this was ground of My asserting:—not the r why it was said, but the justification

plainest proof by inference of the orthodoctrines of the Holy Trinity.

deeper reference of the comparison has been well described by Olshausen: 'Here arises the question, how are we to under-think that the suffering Manhood of Christ was the woman in her pangs, and the same Christ glorified in the Resurrection, the Man born; but the Redeemer (ver. 22) applies the pangs to the disciples: how then will the ἄνθρωπος who is born apply to them?' Then, after condemning the shallow and unsatisfactory method of avoiding deep research by asserting that the details of parables are not to be interpreted, he proceeds:

 'Hence the proper import of the figure seems to be, that the Death of Jesus Christ was as it were an anguish of birth

this verse is,—The way to οὐδὲν ἱρωτᾶν any more, is to ask and to pray the more diligently, till that day comes. It has been supposed wrongly that ἐμὶ and τὸν πατέρα are in opposition in this verse, and thence gathered (Origen de Orat. § 15, vol. i., p. 222, λειτουργία (al. λειτουργία) τοῖνυν προσεύχεσθαι μόνῃ τῷ θεῷ τῷ τῶν ὅλων πατρὶ· ἀλλὰ μὴ χωρὶς τοῦ ἀρχιερέως, κ.τ.λ.) that it is not lawful to address prayer to Christ. But such an opposition is contrary to the whole spirit of these discourses,—and asking the Father is Christ's name, is in fact asking HIM.

In the latter clause, notice the right reading; He shall give it you in my name, He being, as Luthardt expresses it, the element, the region, of all communication between God and the Church. Cf. Rom. i. 8, where thanks are offered διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ. 24.] It was impossible, up to the time of the glorification of Jesus (ἕως ἄρτι, proleptical, as before), to pray to the Father in His Name. It is a fulness of joy peculiar to the dispensation of the Spirit, to be able so to do, Eph. ii. 18.

αἰτέετε] See Matt. vii. 7, and mark the difference between the command then and now,—that ἐν τῷ ὄν. μου is added.

25—33.] Their present real weakness and imperfection, though fancied strength: their future high blessedness and share in His triumph, though in tribulation in the world. 25.] παρομοία, properly, a proverb:—but implying generally in Scriptural and oriental usage something dark and enigmatical;—see especially Sir. vi. 35; viii. 8; xxxix. 17: ‘in dictis tectioribus,’ Bengel. This is true of the whole discourse—and of the discourses of the Lord in general, as they must then have seemed to them, before the Holy Spirit furnished the key to their meaning.

ἔρχεται ὥρα] viz. the same as that indicated in vv. 16 and 23;—but here again, not one ὥρα only exclusive of all others, but to be understood of the several steps of spiritual knowledge.

Olshausen finely remarks, that all human language is a παρομοία, only able to hint at, not to express fully, the things of God; and that the Lord contrasts the use of this weak and insufficient medium, with the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit. This inward teaching, because it is a real imparting of the divine Nature and Life, brings with it not only prayer in the name of Jesus, but a free access to the Father Himself. This παρρησία λαλεῖν however, he continues, is spoken of here by the Lord in its ideal perfection (as it will hereafter be): and is only approximated to on earth; for, as long as the old man yet lives in us, we require still the Lord's intercessory prayer (ch. xvii. 15), daily washing from the pollution of the world; by which Intercession alone the faithful man notwithstanding his imperfection can enjoy in peace the grace of God vouchsafed to him. 26.] ‘The more knowledge, the more prayer in the name of Jesus,’ Lücke. ‘Cognitio parit orationem,’ Bengel. The approaching the Father through Him shall be a characteristic of their higher state under the dispensation of the Spirit.

οὐ λέγω ὑμῖν.] This has been variously understood. Grotius's rendering, ‘prætereo hoc, quasi minus eo quod jam inferam,’ comes I believe the nearest to the truth, 3 K though it does not express the whole meaning. The Lord is now describing the fullness of their state of communion with Himself and the Father by the Spirit. He is setting in the strongest light their reconciliation and access to the Father. He therefore says, Ye shall ask the Father in My name; and I do not now say to you,—I do not now state it in this form,—that I will ask the Father for you—as if there were no relation of love and mercy between the Father and yourselves:—(27) for the Father Himself (αὐτός, i. e. αὐτοῦς; εἰς [Nonnus] — ‘proprio motu’) loveth you;—why? Because ye love and believe on Me. The whole mind of the Father towards mankind is Love: both in Redemption itself (ch. iii. 16),—and then in an especial manner by drawing those who come to Christ (vi. 44),—and again by this fuller manifestation of His love to those who believe on and love Christ. The aim of this saying is to shew them that His intercession (which is still going on under the dispensation of the Spirit, 1 John ii. 1) does not imply their exclusion from access to the Father, but rather ensures that access, by the special love which the Father bears to them who believe in and love His Son: CHRIST being still the efficient cause of the Father’s love to them, and the channel of that Love. No stress must be laid (Lücke) on περιλήκατε here coming before πιστεύετε, as to Faith coming after Love: probably πιστεῖ.

The whole being a misunderstanding of what had gone before, vv. 23, 25. 31.] Our Lord does not clear up their misunderstanding, but leaves that for the coming day of the Spirit. He only assures them that their belief, though sincere and loving, was not so deeply grounded in knowledge of Him and His appointed course as they imagined.

Ἄρτι πιστ. is not a question: this very belief was by our Lord recognized and commended, see ch. xvii. 8, also Matt. xvi. 17, 18. And as Stier remarks (v. 369, edn. 2), 'it was the aim and purpose of the whole prophetic office of Jesus, to prepare some first disciples (not the Apostles alone) for the reception of the Spirit of Truth and the fruits of His Death, by grounding in them firm belief in His Person.' He therefore recognizes their faith; but shews them how weak it as yet was.

with this, see note, Matt. xxvii. 46.

33.] On the first clause, especially ἐν ἑαυτῷ, see ch. xv. 7. This presupposes the return from the scattering in ver. 32,—the branches again gathered in the vine.

ἔχετε, of their normal state in the world.

This θλίψις is not only persecution from the world, but trouble, inward distress, while we are in the world,—ch. xvii. 11;—a comforting sign that we are not of the world (see Stier, v. 373, edn. 2). And this latter idea is implied between the two clauses: 'Be of good cheer; for ye belong not to the world, but to Me, who have (proleptically again, by that which is now at hand) overcome the world, so that it shall have no power over you, externally by persecution, or internally by temptations or discouragements.' See 1 John v. 4, 5.

The parting prayer of the Lord Jesus: and herein, for Himself (1—5): for His disciples (6—19): for all believers, that they may be one (20, 21),—that they may be glorified in the completion of that unity (22—24),—for their abiding in the union of love, the perfection of divine knowledge (25, 26). καὶ εἰπὼν.] It is impossible to regard the following prayer otherwise than as the very words of our Lord Himself,— faithfully rendered by the beloved Apostle in the power of the Holy Spirit. The view which has led so many of the best German Commentators (even Olshausen) to see in parts of it the words of the Evangelist, and not of our Lord, is, it seems to me, inconsistent with any earnest reception of the Gospels as truthful. If such a promise as ch. xiv. 26 was made, and fulfilled, then these must be the words of the Lord Himself;—and the Greek form of them only (and query whether even that? see Prolegg. ch. ii. § ii. (π)) can be regarded as bearing evidence of the style and manner of John. ταῦτα] not, Our

These are a proof that the Son is equal to Father as touching His Godhead. A creature could stand before his Creator

 Thee?'" (Stier.) This glorifythe Father by the Son is, the whole result of the glorification of the Son by

 by καὶ εἰπὼν is this, that the glorification

 the sending, the preparation, and offimind that the 'giving of power' in verse is the ground, as well as the type the glorification, see Rom. i. 28; 1 Co-6: so Stier (v. 383, edn. 2).

But in this wide gift, there is a more special gift,—δ δέδωκες αὐτῷ in the stricter sense,—the chosen, they who believe on Him. And to them, and them only, He imparts the further and ineffable gift consequent on union with Him their God in the Spirit,—viz. ETERNAL LIFE (compare ch. v. 26, 27; also vi. 37).

3.] See a similar definition of a term just used, in ch. iii. 19. δέ, as there, is transitional; bringing out, in fact, the contrast between the incidental mention of the word, and its more solemn definition. ἐστιν

—is; not is the way to. The knowledge spoken of is no mere head or heart knowledge,—the mere information of the mind, or excitation of the feelings,—but that living reality of knowledge and personal realization,—that oneness in will with God, and partaking of His nature, which is itself life eternal:—the knowledge, love, enjoyment, of Him who is infinite, being themselves infinite. ἡ ἑκπαρεῖς τῆς ζωῆς ἐκ τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ περιγίνεται μετοχῆς μετοχὴ δὲ τοῦ ἐστι τὸ γινώσκειν θεόν καὶ ἀπολαύειν τῆς χρηστότητος αὐτοῦ, Iren. adv. Hær. iv. 20. 5, p. 254. The accusatives after γινώσκ. are purely accusatives of the person, and the emphasis is on γινώσκ. From not seeing this, various mistakes have arisen—e.g. the making τὸν μόν. ἀλ. θεόν the predicate, 'Thee to be the only true God,' and similarly with χριστόν (which would require τὸν χρ.) or with ὃν ἀπίστευλας, 'Jesus, whom Thou hast sent, to be (the) Christ,'—or 'Jesus Christ to be Him whom Thou hast sent.' It is rightly rendered in E. V.

The Latin Fathers (Aug. Amb. Hil.), anxious to avoid the inference unwarrantably drawn by some from this verse against the Godhead of Christ, construed: ἵνα γιν. σε κ. 'I. χ. ὃν ἀπ., τὸν μόνον ἀλ. θεόν,—which is of course inadmissible. Others (Chrys. Euth.), construing rightly, yet regarded Jesus Christ as included in the words μόν. ἀλθ. θεόν. But all such violence to the text are unnecessary. For, first, the very juxtaposition of Jesus Christ here with the Father, and the knowledge of δοτῆ being defined to be eternal life, is a proof by implication of the Godhead of the former. The knowledge of God and a creature could not be eternal life, and the juxtaposition of the two would be inconceivable. Secondly, the ὃν ἀπίστευλας most distinctly expresses the ἐξελθὶν from God, ver. 8—implies the ἡμεῖς ἑν of ver. 22, and cannot, in connexion with what follows, possibly be understood in a Socinian, or an Arian sense. I do not scruple to use and preach on the verse as a plain proof of the co-equality of the Lord Jesus in the Godhead. A difficulty has been found in the use of the name JESUS CHRIST by the Lord Himself:—and inferences have been hence made that we have John's own language here:—but surely without any ground. He who said σου τὸν νῖόν, ver. 1, might well here, before the ἔγω of ver. 4, use that prophetic Name which had been divinely given Him as the Saviour of men, and its weighty adjunct χριστός (= υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, i John v. 1, 5), in which Names are all the hidden treasures of that knowledge of which He here speaks.

And as to the later use of the two names together having led to their insertion here by the Apostle (gegen das geschichtliche Decorum, De Wette; similarly Lücke, and even Olshausen),—what if the converse were the case, and this solemn use of them by our Lord had given occasion to their subsequent use by the Church? This is to me much more probable than the other. 4, 5.] The past tenses are proleptical. In the rendering of this whole chapter they should be kept indefinite, not made into perfects as in E. V., which destroys this proleptical character. I glorified Thee . . . I finished . . . What view of the aorist has led to

Dr. Wordsworth's explanation here,—“the aorist is used, not the perfect, inasmuch as the work of glorification was still going on, and not to be completed before His Passion, when He would say τετίλεισται,”—I am quite unable to imagine. That the aorist implies present continuance, is at least a startling doctrine. The force of it here surely is, that our Lord stands by anticipation at the end of His accomplished course, and looks back on it all as past, as historically gathered up in one act: which is the very sense and propriety of the aorist. τὸ ἔργον is not only the ministerial life of our Lord, but the whole Life, with all its appointed manifestations of humility and purity;—the perfect righteousness which by that life He has planted in our nature,—and His prophetic and declarative office, terminated by His Passion and Death. δόξασόν με] Notice the correlation, which Meyer has pointed out, between ἐγώ σοι before and με σύ now. The same Person (ἐγώ) who had with the Father glory before the world, also glorified the Father in the world, and prays to be again received into that glory. A decisive proof of the unity of the Person of Christ, in His three estates of eternal præ-existence in glory, humiliation in the flesh, and glorification in the Resurrection Body. This direct testimony to the eternal præ-existence of the Son of God has been evaded by the Socinian and also the Arminian interpreters, by rendering εἶχον, — ‘habebam destinatione tua,’ Grot. Wetst. On the identity of the δόξα in ver. 22 with this δόξα, see note there. εἶχον] ‘Hic non dicit accepit. Semper habebat: nunquam cepit habere.’ Bengel. πρὸ τοῦ τ. κ. εἶν.] before prophetically spoken. 7.] πάντα ὅσα ἔδωκ. μοι, 'My whole words and works:'

ἐλόν, as contemplated in their separate meanings and testimonies: q. d. 'are all from Thee':—the collective assertion see at ver. 10. On this their conviction, which however had not reached its ripeness yet, see ch. xvi. 30.

8.] Notice particularly here, as indeed throughout,
the marked difference between the aorists
and the perfects. τὰ ῥ.—ἔδωκ. αὐτοῖς, and the similar sayings ch. xv. 15 al., seem to be a reference to Deut. xviii. 18, 19, where it is said that the Prophet 'shall speak unto them all that I shall command Him.' The imparting to them of these ῥήματα was the efficient cause of their faith:—see their confession ch. vi. 68, 69, where πιστεύομεν and ἔγνώκαμεν are connected as here.

On the two last clauses we may notice that παρὰ σοῦ ἐξηλθον is more a matter of conviction from inference (see ch. iii. 2),—ἔγνωσαν:—whereas the other side of the same truth, σύ με ἀ-πέστειλας, the act of the Father unseen by us, is more a matter of pure faith,— ἐπίστευσαν. In the first, the ἔγνωσαν ἀληθῶς stamps our Lord's approval on their knowledge, and distinguishes it from such knowledge as the bare οἶδμεν of Nicodemus and his colleagues.

9.] Stier remarks, that the Lord here begins to fulfil His promise Matt. x. 32. ἐγὼ περὶ τ. κόσμ. ἔρ.] The misconceptions which have been made of this verse (Calvin,

Lampe, and even Luther, who elsewhere corrects himself, see Tholuck on John, ed.
6, p. 352) as implying a decree of exclusion for the vessels of wrath, may be at once removed by considering the usage of ὁ κόσμος in this Prayer. The Lord does pray distinctly for ὁ κόσμος, vv. 21, 23, that they may believe and know that the Father hath sent Him. He cannot therefore mean here that He does not pray (absolutely) for the world, but that He is not now asking for the world, does not pray this thing for the world. These (οὗς δι-δωκάς μοι) have already believed and known; the prayer for them is therefore a different one, viz. that in vv. 11, 15. The mistake would be at once precluded for English readers by the paraphrase, I am praying for them; I am not praying for the world. ἐνι σοὶ εἰσιν]

in a fuller sense than σοὶ ἦσαν, ver. 6.
That was their preparation for Christ;
this is their abiding in Him, which is abiding in the Father, see next verse.

10.] Compare ch. xvi. 15 and note. "It were not so much if He had only said,
'All Mine is Thine;' for that we may all say, that all we have is God's. But this is a far greater thing, that He invert^s this and says, 'All Thine is Mine.' This can no creature say before God." Luther, Stier, v. 418, edn. 2. The E. V.,—
'All Mine are Thine,' &c.—gives the erroneous impression that persons only are meant, whereas it is all things, in the widest meaning,—the Godhead itself in-11.] The occasion, and substance of His prayer for them. οὐκ ἔτι εἰμ.

ἐν τ. κ.] This shows us that δ κόσμ. is not said of place alone, for the Lord Jesus is still here; but of state, the state of men in the flesh; sometimes viewed on its darker side, as overcoming men and bringing in spiritual death,—sometimes, as here, used in the most general sense. καὶ, not but; it expresses the simultaneous state of the Lord and His, see ch. xvi. 32, and note.

ἅγιε] Holy, as applied to God, peculiarly expresses that penetration of all His attributes by LOVE, which He only who here uttered it sees through in its length, breadth, and height:—which angels (Isa. vi. 3; Rev. iv. 8) feel and express:—which men are privileged to utter, but can never worthily feel:—but which devils can neither feel nor worthily utter (see Mark i. 24). They know His Power and His Justice only. But His Holiness is especially employed in this work of τηρεῖν now spoken of. ἐν τῷ ὀν. σου] not 'through Thine own Name,' as E. Ver. 18 is proleptic,—and received its fulfilment ch. xx. 21. He does not merely leave them in the world, but sends them into it, to witness to this same truth of God: see ch. xv. 16. 19.] See above on ver. 17. Notice, says Meyer, the emphatic correlation of αὐτῶν—ἐγὼ ἑμαυτόν—καὶ αὐτοί.

It is clear against all Socinian inferences from this verse, that all that part of ἀγιάζειν implied in ch. x. 36 is here excluded: and only that intended which is expressed Heb. ii. 10 by διὰ παθημάτων τελειῶσαι. Of this, His death was the crowning act, and was also the one to which the ὑπὲρ πάντων most directly applies; but the whole is included. The confining the meaning to His sacrifice (Chrys., Euthym.), and the ἵνα καὶ αὐτοὶ to their martyrdom, or their spiritual self-offering, Rom. xii. 1 (Euthym.), is insufficient for the depth of the words. ἐν ἀλήθ.] in truth: what truth, is evident from ver. 17, where, in the repetition, ὁ λόγ. ὁ σοὺς ἀλήθειά ἐστιν, the article is also wanting: see also ch. i. 14; iv. 24; 3 John 3,—for ἀλήθ. But the distinction is perhaps somewhat obscured after a preposition. 20.] The connexion is the ἀπίστεια αὐτοῦς εἰς τ. κόσμ., ver 18. The present part. expresses the state of faith in which all believers are found: the future (of the rec.) would refer more to the act of belief by which that state is begun. But perhaps it is best to take pres. as proleptic.

It is striking set forth here that all subsequent on Christ would take place through apostolic word: see Rom. x. 16, 17.

21.] The ἵνα here hardly can regard subject-matter of the ἔρωτῶ, ver. 20 rather we should supply after that ταῦτα, and understand this ἵνα as pressing the object of the prayer respecting both. The subject-matter of the prayer is, that they may be kept in God's and sanctified in God's truth; and it be so, their unity with the Son and Father follows, 1 John i. 3. But here not merely 'with,' but in, the Son the Father;—because the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, and that is joined to the Lord, is one Spirit see ver. 11. This unity has its true only ground in faith in Christ through the Word of God as delivered by the titles; and is therefore not mere outward uniformity, nor can such uniformity duce it. At the same time its effect to be real and visible, such that the world may see them. ἵνα πιστ.] not parallel with the former ἵνα, as if πιστ. ὁ meant the same as πάντες ἐν ὧσιν, the may be brought to believe. Nor can the words mean that the unbelievers and condemned world, at the end, are persuaded 'that Thou hast sent Me,' a rendering would surely be repugnant to the spirit of the prayer, and the use of word πιστεύω in our Gospel. Rather—'that this their testimony, being believed by them all, and in all ages, may come to convince the world, so that many in world may believe,' &c. The ὅτι σὺ με ἀπέστειλας implies belief in the whole Work and Office of Christ. Here our Lord certainly prays for the world,—see above on ver. 9.

See a remarkable parallel, Rev. iii. 9, where, as Stier truly remarks, the persons spoken of are penitents.

²³. ²³.] Grotius and others interpret this δὲξα, 'potestas faciendi miracula,' and refer to ch. ii. 11 and ch. xi. 40; but wrongly:—for if so, the αὐτοῖς must mean the Apostles only, whereas it is distinctly referred to the believers of all time. The δὲξα is (Lücke, De Wette, Stier:—Meyer understands it of the heavenly glory, Rom. viii. 17) the glory of Christ as the only-begotten Son (ch. i. 14), full of grace and truth (see ver. 5 and note), which by virtue of His exaltation and the unity of all believers in Him through the Spirit, has become (not, shall be) theirs, Eph. ii. 6: Rom. viii. 30; Eph. i. 18; not yet fully, nor as it is His, but as each can receive and shew it forth. The perfection of it is spoken of, ver. 24. We have the same recurrences of ἵνα as in ver. 21, and the same dependence (see var. readd.). The second of them here expresses not merely the similarity of their unity to that of the Son and Father,—but the actuality of its subsistence, in Christ abiding in them and the Father in Christ.

On τετελ. eis ἔν, see ref. γινώσκῃ here, parallel as it is to πιστεύσῃ above, cannot be interpreted of a bare recognition, or of a recognition at the final judgment,—but must be taken to mean that salutary knowledge by which from time to time the children of the world are by God called to become the children of light. See the same words, and note, ch. xiv. 31, also ch. xiii. 35, and observe that in all three places the recognition is that of love;—in ch. xiii. 35, of the disciples one to another; in ch. xiv. 31, of Jesus to the Father; here, of the Father to believers, as perfected into unity in the Son of His love.

"Observe," says Meyer, "how the glance of the Intercessor reaches in these verses even to the highest aim of His work on earth, when the world shall be believing, and Christ Himself actually the Saviour of the world, ch. iv. 42, cf. ch. x. 16."

²⁴. ὁ δέδωκάς μοι] The neuter has a peculiar solemnity, uniting the whole Church together as one gift of the Father to the Son: see ch. vi. 39, note. Then the ἐκείνοι resolves it into the great multitude whom no man can number, and comes home to the heart of every individual believer with inexpressible sweet assurance of an eternity with Christ.

Θέλω is not the θέλω of ch. xii. 21; 1 Cor. vii. 7, but more like that of Mark vi. 26,—an expression of will founded on acknowledged right: compare διατίθεμαι, Luke xxii. 29. Compare also the θέλω and ὁ δίδωκε μοι, with ch. v. 21; vi. 44.

most glorious part of this sight of glory will be to behold the whole mystery of redemption unfolded in the glory of Christ's Person,—and to see how, before the being of the creature, that eternal Love was, which gave the glory to Christ of which all creation is but the exponent. On κατ. κόσ. see reff. 25, 26.] δίκαιε is connected with the final clause of ver. 24. The Righteousness of the Father is witnessed by the beginning (πρὸ κατ. κόσμ.) of Redemption, and (καταίνοι ὄσιν) by the glorification of the elect from Christ; but also by ὁ κόσμος σε οὐκ ἔγνω,—the final distinction made by His Justice between the world and His.

The first καὶ is in the quasi-disjunctive usage so common with our Evangelist, see ch. xvi. 32, note,—and contrasts with the καὶ immediately following: the more classical construction would be καὶ—δι (Lücke). The second καὶ merely couples the preceding to the following as depending upon it: see Matt. xi. 27. This ἔγνω, ἔγνωσαν, ἐγνώρισα, γνωρίσω, shew that our Lord spoke here of the then present time and disciples again, at the close of His prayer.

The γνωρίσω is by the whole work and testimony of the Spirit completed in the Kingdom of God. This promise has been in fulfilment through all the history of the Church. And the great result of this manifestation of the Father's name is, that the wonderful Love wherewith He loved Christ, may dwell in (not the Apostles merely—the future γνωρίσω has again thrown the meaning onward to the great body of believers) them,—i. e. the perfect, living knowledg of God in Christ, which reveals, and in is, this love. And this can only be καγὼ ἐν αὐτοῖς—Christ dwelling in the hearts by faith, and renewing and enlightening them by His Spirit. He does say, 'Thou in them'—but I in them. Thou in Me: see ver. 23.

On the omission by John of the conflict the Redeemer's soul in Gethsemane would remind the reader of what has been said in the Prolegomena on the character of this Gospel. The attempt to find in the omission a discrepancy between the setting forth of the Redeemer by John and Synoptic Gospels, is, as usual, unsuccessful. John presents us with most striking instances of the troubling of the human soul of Christ by the suffering which was before Him: see ch. xii. 23—27; xiii. 21. Compare notes on Matt. ver. 36, and throw out the section. 1. τῶν κένδρων] This is evidently a Greek corruption of the Hebrew (קנדר); and coincides with the L¹ in ref. and 3 Kings xv. 13, where howe F has τοῦ κένδρων. τῶν κισσῶν. Instances of the practice of changing foreign names into other words bearing sense in the new language are common in all countries. This being so, it is perhaps safer to follow the best MSS., even against our own conviction, that St. John can hardly have written τῶν κισσῶν. Josephus calls it χειμ. κισσῶνος, or φάραγξ κισσῶνος. Lücke suggests that the owner of this garden may have been friendly to (or a disciple of?) Jesus. It was called Gethsemane,—Matt., Mark.

Traditions as to its site are, as usual, various. A square plot of ground in the depth of the ravine is now usually pointed out, and seems to have been fixed on at the time when the empress Helena visited Jerusalem, A.D. 326. Euseb. says Gethsemane was at the Mount of Olives: Jerome, at the foot of the mount. The language of Luke xxi. 37 leads to a belief that it may have been higher up the mount. Robinson, i. 346.

Lücke refers to Dion. Hal. ix. (ἐκτρέχον ἄπαντες ἐκ τῶν σκεπῶν ἀρόοι, φανός εἶχοντες κ. λαμπάδας) to shew that lanterns and torches were part of the utensils of military on a night march.

φανός appear to be strictly torches,—any blazing substance held in the hand;—and λαμπάδες, lights, fed with oil.

The weapons were swords and staves,—Matt., Mark. The fact of its being full moon did not make the lights unnecessary, as, in searching for a prisoner, they might have to enter dark places.

Roman soldiers, who had it in command 'to apprehend Jesus of Nazareth.' εἰσότητες . . . μετ' αὐτῶν] I believe these words to be the description of an eyewitness;—John detected Judas standing among them, and notices the detail, as is his constant habit, by way of enhancing the tragic character of the history. The synoptic narrative related the kiss which presently took place; but this self-tradition of our Lord was not related in it. John therefore adds this touch of exactness, to shew that the answer Ἰησοῦν τ. N. was not given because they were ignorant of His Person, so as not to be able to say 'Thee';—but because they feared to say it. 6.] The question on the miraculous nature of this incident is not whether it were a miracle at all (for it is evident that it must be regarded as one), but whether it were an act especially intended by our Lord, or a result of the superhuman dignity of His person and the majestic calmness of His reply. I believe the latter alternative to be the right one. Commentators cite various instances of the confusion of the enemies of innocent men before the calmness and dignity of their victims: how much more was this likely to be the case when He in whom was no sin, and who spake as never man spake, came forth to meet His implacable foes as the self-sacrificing Lamb of God. So that I regard it rather as a miracle consequent upon that which Christ said and did, and the state of mind in which His enemies were,—than as one, in the strict sense, wrought by Him: bearing however always in mind, that to Him nothing was unexpected, or a mere result, but every thing foreknown. With this view what follows is also consistent, rather than with the other. The distinction is an important one, as the view which we take of our Lord's mind towards His captors: enter, as an element, into our understanding of the whole of this scene, and in of the solemn occurrences which follow. Such incidents as this are not related by the Evangelists, and least of all by St. John, as mere astounding facts, but as ground on which we are to enquire, and determine for ourselves, as to the "glory, full of glory, and truth," which was in Him, whom having seen, we love. 8.] Bengel strikingly says of this ἔγώ εἰμι 'T dicet olim.' And Augustine, 'Quid caturus faciet, qui judicandus hoc facit. Quid regnaturus poterit, qui moritur hoc potuit?' Tract. cxii. 3. 9.] τούτους] 'quos illi cæci adorabatur Bengel. This saying was sufficient to shew Peter and the rest what was appointed course for them;—the δὲ ἐπάγειν to the band, is ἐπάγειν to the Apostles. 9.] See ch. 12. An unquestionable proof, if any wanted, that the words of ch. xvii. a mere description of the mind of our Lord at the time, nor free arrangement of words, but his very words themselves. is recognized even by De Wette. the application of the saying, we must mark that the words unquestionably much deeper meaning than any belong to this occasion; but that the remark often made in this commentary on the filiment of prophecies must be born in mind;—that to "fulfil" a prophecy is to exhaust its capability of being and again fulfilled:—that the words of the Lord have many stages of fulfilment—and that the temporal deliverance of the Apostles now, doubtless was but a

There is no real difficulty in this rendering, if Annas and Caiaphas lived in one palace, or at all events transacted public affairs in one and the same. They would naturally have different apartments, and thus the sending from one to the other would be very possible; as also would the incident related by Luke xxii. 61:—see the extract from Robinson, Matt. xxvi. 69, note. "The Evangelist had no need to relate the hearing before Caiaphas, for he has related ch. xi. 47 ff.: and we have ere this been familiarized with the habit of our Evangelist not to narrate any further the outward process, where he has already by anticipation substantially given us its result." αὐτοὶ οὐκ εἰσῆλ.] I have already discussed the difficulties attending the subject. Lord's last Passover, in the note on xxvi. 17—19. I will add here some marks of Friedlieb's, Arch. der Leid. 'The Jews would not enter the torium that they might not be defile that they might eat the Passover. the entrance of a Jew into the house Gentile made him unclean till the ev It is surprising, that according to the clarification of the Holy Evangelists, they had yet to eat the Passover, whereas and His disciples had already eaten the previous night. And it is no less surprising, that the Jews in the early morning should have been afraid of rendering selves unclean for the Passover,—sin Passover could not be kept till evening on the next day, and the uncleanness they dreaded did not, by the law, last the next day. For this reason, the p in John labours under no small external difficulties, which we cannot altogether solve, from want of accurate knowledge of the customs of the time. Possibly the Levitical defilements and prohibitions had in that age been made stringent or otherwise modified; possibly they called some other meal, besides actual Passover, by its name. This is certainly, with our present knowledge of Hebrew antiquities, must assume; if law respecting uncleanness will not allow us to interpret this passage of the proper Passover on the evening of the 14th of Nisan, nor indeed of any evening meal at all.

The whole depends on this: can φαγεῖν τὸ πάσχα mean any thing else besides eating the paschal lamb in the strict sense? This is a question which in our day we have no power of answering; and, as De Wette has shewn (in loc.), none of the instances cited on the affirmative side are applicable. See note on ch. xix. 14.

Mr. Wratislaw, in his little volume of Sermons and Dissertations (Lond. J. W. Parker, 1859), has proposed a solution of the difficulties which is at least very ingenious. Its chief point is, that the Jews, reckoning their days from evening to evening, and also holding two evenings, the former beginning at 3 p.m., the other at sunset, the space between the evenings, during which the passover was to be sacrificed (Exod. xii. 6), might be reckoned indifferently, sometimes as part of the preceding, sometimes as part of the following day. Then he thinks that in order to avoid any mistake, they considered the 14th Nisan to begin at 3 on Thursday p.m., and to end at sunset on Good Friday, thus extending the day to its utmost possible limit. He instances similar confusion between the 14th and 15th Nisan, or rather Abib, in Ex. xii. 18, Lev. xxiii. 6, arising from the space between the evenings being reckoned in the one case as belonging to the former, and in the other as belonging to the latter day; and suggests that the same ambiguity will account for Josephus's statement that the Jews kept the feast of unleavened bread for eight days.

Thus, he says, any time after 3 p.m. on Thursday might be called by St. Mark "the first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the passover," and by St. Luke, "the day of unleavened bread, when the Passover must be killed," it being killed after the first and before the second evening on Friday, and thus, loosely speaking, within the day, which commenced at 3 o'clock, and, strictly speaking, within that which commenced at sunset on Thursday. Similarly any time after 3 or sunset on the Thursday might be called the παρασκευή or preparation of the passover, which was to be eaten at some time after sunset on the Friday.

Then he understands, that the disciples made all preparations on Thursday afternoon for the passover, which was to be killed the next afternoon, and eaten the following night: and that the passover of which our Lord so earnestly desired to partake, was that which was thus prepared, but of which He knew He was not Himself destined to partake. This he supports by the true reading (omitting the οὐκίρι) in Luke xxii. 16.

"If this view," he adds, "be accepted, there is no longer any question, as far as the passover is concerned, about reconciling St. John with the synoptical Gospels. The eucharist will thus have been instituted at an ordinary meal, eaten the evening before the paschal feast in the same room in which it was intended afterwards to celebrate the passover." See this more fully illustrated in the vol. above alluded to, pp. 168—175.

The main objections to it seem to me to be, 1) the total absence of any trace of such an usage, of eating a preliminary solemn meal in the passover-chamber; 2) the plain and undeniable impression on the mind of every unbiassed reader of the synoptic Gospels, that the meal of our Lord and the Twelve was a passover, and that His ἑσθίειν ἑσθίμενα describes, not that which He desired to do, owing however to His predetermined course would not do,—but that which He was then doing in the fulfilment of that His earnest desire.

So that I am afraid Mr. Wratislaw's ingenious solution leaves us, for all essentials of the question, where we were before: merely, by suggesting the introduction of possible new elements of confusion, giving us an additional warning not to be rash in assuming a discrepancy between the Evangelists, where computations of time may have been so vague and various.

under which Jesus was brought before him, he demanded a formal accusation on which legally to proceed: "se scire dissimulat," Rupert. in Meyer. ^{30.}] They do not mention the charge of blasphemy brought against Him by the Sanhedrim, for fear of the entire rejection of their cause, as by Gallio, Acts xviii. 16. The Procurators in such cases had a discretionary power. On what they did say, Grot. observes, "Quod probationibus deerat, id supplere volunt sua auctoritate."

^{31.}] This answer is best regarded as an ironical reproach founded on their apparently proud assertion in ver. 30—and amounting to this:—'If you suppose I am to have such implicit confidence in your judgment concerning this prisoner as to take his guilt on your word, take him and put him to death (for επιναρε must be thus understood,—see below) according to your law;’ reminding them that the same Roman power which had reserved capital cases for his jurisdiction, also expected proper cognizance to be taken of them, and not that he should be the mere executioner of the Sanhedrim. ἡμ. οὐκ ἔξ.]

From the time when Archelaus was deposed (A.D. 6 or 7), and Judæa became a Roman province, it would follow by the Roman law that the Jews lost the power of life and death. Josephus tells us, Antt. xx. 9. 1, that οὐκ ἔξον ἦν χωρὶς τῆς ἐκείνου (the Procurator's) γνώμης καθίσαι συνέδριον,—i. e. to hold a court of judgment in capital cases. Some have thought that this power was reserved to them in religious matters, as of blasphemy and sacrilege; but no proof has been adduced of this; the passages commonly alleged—Jos. Antt. xiv. 10. 2; B. Jud. vi. 2. 4, and Acts vii. 58, not applying (see note on Acts ut supra). The Talmud relates that had taken place forty years (or mor Lücke, ii. 737 note) before the destrⁿ of Jerusalem. Biscoe, on the

pp. 134—167, argues at great length the Jews had this power; and the words here merely mean that they not put to death on the Sabbath, according to the usual custom of executing the next day after judgment, would have been the case. But this treatment of the words is unjustifiable. Can suppose for a moment that this can be meant, when there is not a word in the text to imply it? We may hope the day for such forced interpretation is fast passing away. Friedlieb gives the most consistent account of the matter. In the Roman provinces the Propætor or Proconsul conducted judicial proceedings. But Judæa, which belonged to the province of Syria, was an exception. There was a curator cum potestate, who exercised right of judicial cognizance. Jerusalem however possessed the privilege of judging all lighter causes before the three twenty, and heavier causes, with the exception of judicial de capite, before the great Sanhedrim: so that none but reserved cases remained for the Procurator. Pilate seems to have judged these cases on his visits during the festivals; which fall conveniently for the purpose, in the custom in Jerusalem, to execute criminals at the Feasts. In other provinces the governors made circuits and held courts throughout their jurisdictions. See subject Lücke's note, ii. 736.

See Matt. xx. 19 al.;—ch. xii. 32 Had the Jews taken Him and judged Him he would have been stoned, not crucified.

And this whole section, vv. 28—32, serves to shew how the divine purpose was accomplished.

³³.] This question probably arose out of what Pilate had previously heard, not from any charge to this effect being made between our vv. 31 and 34. Had such a charge been made, our Lord's question ver. 34 would be unnatural.

Pilate summoned Jesus in, who had been as yet outside with the Jews. This was the formal reception of the case before him;—as the Roman soldiers must now have formally taken charge of Jesus, as servants of the Roman authorities: having previously, when granted by Pilate to the Chief Priests, acted as their police.

The judgments of the Romans were always public and sub dio, see ch. xix. 13;—but the enquiries and examinations might be private. In this case Pilate appears to have wished to obtain an account from Jesus apart from the clamours of the chief priests and the mob.

³⁴.] On this whole interview, see note on Luke vv. 3, 4. I regard this question ἀπὸ σεαυτοῦ. c.r.l. as intended to distinguish the senses of the word King as applied to Jesus: and of course not (De Wette, Lücke) for the information of Him who asked it, but to bring out this distinction in Pilate's mind. If he asked of himself, the word could certainly have but one meaning, and that one would be wrongly applied;—if from information derived from the Jews, this very fact would open the way to the true meaning in which He was King of the Jews. Stier and Ebrard think there may be some reference in ἀπὸ σεαυτοῦ to a momentary earnestness in Pilate's own mind,—a suspicion that his prisoner was what he was charged with being (see ch. xix. 8, 12), from the mention of which he immediately (ver. 35) recoils, and implies the other side of the dilemma.

³⁵.] Pilate at once repudiates the idea of his having any share in Jewish expectations, or taking any personal interest in Jewish matters: all his information he has derived from the public accusation of the people and chief priests. Then in τί ἐστ. is implied, 'There is no definiteness in their charge: let me have thine own account, thy ex-parte statement, that I may at least know something definite of the case.'

οὐκ . . . ἐκ τοῦ κ. τούτ.] not belonging to (ch. viii. 23; x. 16) this world; not springing from, arising out of, this world;—and therefore not to be supported by this world's weapons. There is no denial that His Kingdom is over this world—but that it is to be established by this world's power. The words not only deny, they affirm: if not of this world, then of another world. They assert this other world before the representative of those who boasted of their 'orbis terrarum.' Notice the solemn repetition of ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου τούτου. οἱ ἄγγ.] certainly not angels (as Stier) nor angels and disciples (as Lampe).

This sentence is elliptical, and οἱ ὑπηρ. is included under the supposition introduced by εἰ. 'If &c.,—I should have had servants, and those servants would have fought.'

παρὰδοθῶ] This delivering up is referred to ch. xix. 16—παρίδωκεν αὐτὸν αὐτοῖς. The ὦν has been absurdly pressed by the Romanist interpreters to mean that at some time His Kingdom would be ἐντεῦθεν—i. e. ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου τούτου—as if its essential character could ever be changed.

ὦν implies, 'as the case now stands';—a demonstratio ad oculos from the fact that no servants of His had contended or were contending in his behalf; see similar usages of ὦν, ch. viii. 40; ix. 41; xv. 22, 24; Rom. vii. 16, 17 al.

37.] It is best to take οἰκούν β. εἰ σύ as interrogative, Art Thou then a King? on account of what follows.

σὺ, emphatic and sarcastic.

σὺ λέγεις] A formula neither classical nor found in the LXX, but frequent in the Rabbinical writings; see Schöttgen, Hor. Hebr. on Matt. xxvi. 25.

It seems best to punctuate at λέγεις, and regard ὅτι as the reason for the affirmation conveyed in σὺ λέγεις. This agrees best with the order of the words, β. εἰμι. [ἐγώ], and with the continued affirmation which follows. The first ἐγώ, if genuine, refers to Pilate's σὺ.

ἐγὼ . . . τῇ ἀληθείᾳ] Our Lord here preached the Truth of his mission, upholding that side of it best calculated for the doubting philosophic mind of the day, of which Pilate was a partaker. He declares the unity and objectivity of Truth;—and that Truth must come from above, and must come through a Person sent by God, and that that Person was Himself.

ἐγώ, both times emphatic, and majestically set (see above) against the preceding scornful

τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, not ἀλήθειαν; not 'the truth,' so that He said should be true,—but to the in its objective reality:—see ch. xv. 19, of which deep saying this is the explanation for his present hearer. The Lord, besides, sets forth here depth of these words, the very idea of kingdom. The King is the representative of the truth: the truth of dealing between man and man;—the truth of that which in its inmost truth belongs to great and only Potentate, the King.

Again, the Lord, the King of manhood and the world, the second came to testify to the truth of man and the world, which sin and Satan concealed. question is perhaps more the result of indifference than of scepticism; it expresses, not without scoff and irony, a conviction that truth can never be found: and is an apt representative of the state of the polite Gentile mind at the time of the Lord's coming. It was rather an inability than an unwillingness to find the truth. He waits for no answer, nor did the question require any. Nay, it was no real question, any more than τί μοι ε. σοί, or any other, behind which a negation lies hid. ἐγὼ οὐδὲμ. αἰτ. . . .] ἐγὼ, opposed to ὑμῖν, who had found fault in Him. Pilate mocks both—the Witness to the Truth, and the haters of the Truth. His conduct presents a pitiable specimen of the moral weakness of that spirit of worldly power, which reached its culminating point in the Roman empire. 39.] At this place comes in Matt. xvi. 12—14;—the repeated accusation of Jesus by the chief priests and elders, to which He answered nothing;—and Luke xiii. 5—16, the sending to Herod, and second proclamation of His innocence by Pilate,—after which he adopts this method of procuring His release (Luke, ver. 17). ἐστὶν συνήθ.] See note Matt. xvii. 15, and compare, for an instructive specimen of the variations in the Gospel narratives, the four accounts of this incident. 40.] They have not before cried out in this narrative: so that some circumstances must be presupposed which are not here related: unless vv. 30 and 31 be referred to. ἦν δὲ ὁ Β. λ.] In Mark xv. 7, Luke xiii. 19, a rioter;—but doubtless also a robber, as such men are frequently found foremost in civil uproar. There is a solemn irony in these words of the Apostle—a Robber! See the contrast strongly brought out Acts iii. 14. Luthardt (after Kraft) remarks on the parallelism with Levit. xvi. 5—10. Thus was Jesus 'the goat upon which the Lord's lot fell, to be offered for a sin-offering.' See the same idea expanded by Mr. Wratislaw, in the first of the sermons in his volume. CHAP. XIX. 1.] The reason or purpose of this scourging does not here appear; but in Luke xiii. 21—23 we read that after the choice of Barabbas, Pilate asked them what should be done with Jesus? And when they demanded that He should be crucified, Pilate, after another assertion of his innocence, said παιδεύσας αὐτὸν ἀπολύσω. Thus it is accounted for.

2. 3. κ. ἤρχοντο πρ. αὐτ.] This has been probably erased as not being understood. It was their mock-reverential approach, as to a crowned king: coming probably with obeisances and pretended homage. In the χαῖρε ὁ β. τ. Ἰουδαίων, 'non tam Christum de-rident, quam Judæis insultant:' Lampe. See notes on Matt. vv. 27—30;—and on πορφύραν, Mark ver. 17.

4.] The unjust and cruel conduct of Pilate appears to have had for its object to satisfy the multitude by the mockery and degradation of the so-called King of the Jews: and with that view he now brings forth Jesus. His speech is equivalent to—'See what I have done purely to please you—for I believe Him innocent.'

5.] is the accurate and graphic delineation of an eye-witness, and intimately connected with the speech of Pilate which follows. For the ἰδὼν ὁ β. τ. is to move their contempt and pity;—'See this man who submit and has suffered these indignities—can He ever stir up the people, or Himself up for King? Now cease to persecute Him; your malice surely is to be satisfied.'

6.] This had cried before, see Matt. ver. 22 and p. 16. Possibly St. John had not heard cry. According as men have been in different parts of a mob, they will naturally report differently, according as nearest to them cried out.

7.] The words of Pilate shew vacillations between his own sense of the innocence of Jesus and his fear of displeasing the Jews and their rulers. He now, but in irony, mockery, as before, ch. xviii. 31, delves the matter entirely into their hands perhaps after having received the message from his wife, Matt. ver. 19.

7.] In consequence of this taunt, they declare the cause of their condemnations of Him—see Levit. xxiv. 16—and their demand that, though found innocent

12. δεδομίνη, not δεδομένη:—the neuter is more general, requiring the supply, as Meyer, of τὸ ἐξουσιάζειν κατ' ἐμοῦ,—and embraces in itself the whole delegation from above, power included —q. d. except by appointment from above. Lampe (in loc.) remarks: 'Concedit Pilato 1) potestatem. Agnoscebat fori humani auctoritatem, quia regnum ejus non erat terrenum, humanos magistratus destruens. Neque Pilato et Romanis jus in Judæos disputabat. . . . 2) Exaggerat illam potestatem, ut superne datam. because of what has just been asserted, οὐκ εἶχες κ.τ.λ. The connexion is somewhat difficult. I take it to be this: 'God has given to thee power over me;—not insight into the character which I claim, that of being the Son of God—but simply power: that insight belonged to others, viz. the Sanhedrim, and their president, whose office it was to judge that claim; they have judged against the clearest evidence and rejected me, the Son of God; thy sin, that of blindly exercising thy power, sin though it be, is therefore less than theirs, who being God's own people, and with God's word of prophecy before them (and the High Priest, with his own prophetic word before him,—see ch. xviii. 14), deliberately gave me over into thy hand.' It is important to this, which I believe to be the only right understanding of the words, to remember that Pilate, from ver. 6, was making himself simply their tool;—He was the sinful, but same time the blind instrument of deliberate malice. Nearly so Lüd De Wette. Bengel and Stier under 'quia Me non nosti' as the subject τοῦτο, but Lücke rightly says that ἀνωθεν, and nothing else must be subject. So Meyer also. ὁ παρ

Beyond question, Caiaphas,—to the initiative on the Jewish side longed; 'cujus auctoritate omnia agitur,' Lampe. At the same time the Sanhedrim are probably included the guilt of their chief.

In ἀμαρτίαν is an implied reference higher Judge—nay, that Judge H speaks. 12.] ἐκ τ., from this

—viz. these two last remarks. 'In such a perplexity, a man like Pilate could not long hesitate. As Caiaphas had before said it were better that one even innocent man should die, than that all should perish: so now in like case Pilate decided rather to sacrifice Jesus though innocent, than to expose himself to so great danger.' Friedlieb, Arch. der Leid. § 34. ξξω: see on ch. xviii. 33. The βῆμα was in front of the praetorium, on an elevated platform; —Gabbatha, probably from גב, altus fuit, —which was paved with a tessellated pavement. Such a pavement Julius Caesar carried about on his expeditions, Suet. Cæs. c. 46. 14. παρασκευὴ τοῦ π.] The signification, 'Friday in the Passover week' (using παρασκευὴ for 'day before the sabbath,' as reff. Matt., Luke, and τοῦ π. as in σάββατον τοῦ π. Ps. Ign. ad Philip. c. 13, p. 937, ed. Migne), has found many and some recent defenders: see especially Wieseler, Chron. Synops. i. 335 ff. But this is not its natural meaning, nor would it ever have been thought of in this place, but for the difficulty arising from the whole Passover question, which I have discussed on Matt. xxvi. 17—19, and on ch. xviii. 28.

παρασκευὴ τοῦ π. answers to νύκτα γρη, and is 'the vigil of the Passover,' i. e. the day preceding the evening when the passover was killed. And so it must be understood here, especially when connected with ch. xviii. 28. See on the whole matter the notes above referred to. ὥρα ὡς ἑκτῇ] There is an insuperable difficulty as the text now stands. For Mark relates, ch. xv. 25, that the crucifixion took place at the third hour: and that it certainly was so, the whole arrangement of the day testifies. For on the one hand, the judgment could hardly have taken the whole day till noon: and on the other, there will not thus be time left for the rest of the events of the day, before the sabbath began. We must certainly suppose, as did Eusebius, Theophylact, and Severus (in the Catena, Lücke, ii. 756), that there has been some very early erratum in our copies; whether the interchange of 7 (3) and 6 (6), or some other, cannot now be determined. Lücke and Friedlieb defend the sixth hour: but the above difficulties seem to me decisive against it.

We certainly may approximate the two accounts by recollecting that as the crucifixion itself certainly did not (as in Mark) take place exactly at the third hour, and as here it is ὥρα ὡς ἑκτῇ, some intermediate time may be described by both Evangelists. But this is not satisfactory: see note on Mark xv. 25. The solution given by Dr. Wordsworth after Townson and others, that St. John's reckoning of the hours is different, and like our own, so that the sixth hour = 6 A.M., besides being unsupported by any authority (see ch. i. 40, iv. 6, 52: xi. 9, and notes), would leave here the difficulty that there must thus elapse three hours between the hearing before Pilate and the Crucifixion. Besides which, we may ask, is it possible to imagine St. John, with the other gospels before him as these expositors believe him to have had, adopting without notice an independent reckoning of his own which would introduce utter confusion into that history which (again on their hypothesis) he wrote his gospel to complete and clear up? The words ὥρα ὡς ἑκτῇ. seem

The tunic was the so-called 'toga ocellata,' or 'byssina.' It reached from the neck to the feet, and was fastened round the throat with a clasp. It was properly a priest's garment (see Jos. Antt. iii. 7. 4), and was woven of linen, or perhaps of wool (Friedlieb). The citation is verbatim from the LXX. In it, Considering then that John's habit of not naming himself might extend to his mother (he names his father, ch. xxi. 2), we may well believe that ἡ ἀδελφὴ τ. μητρὸς αὐτοῦ here represents Salome, and that four women are designated by this description. about to close; hence He commends her to another son who should care for and protect her. Thus,—as at the marriage in Cana, when His official independence of her was to be testified, so now,—He addresses her as γύναι. 27.] The solemn and affecting commendation of her to John is doubly made,—and thus bound by the strongest injunctions on both. The Romanist idea, that the Lord commended all His disciples, as represented by the beloved one, to the patronage of His mother, is simply absurd. The converse is true: He did solemnly commend the care of her, especially indeed to the beloved disciple, but in him to the whole cycle of disciples, among whom we find her, Acts i. 14.

No certain conclusion can be drawn from this commendation, as to the 'brethren of the Lord' believing on Him or not at this time. The reasons which influenced Him in his selection must ever be far beyond our penetration:—and whatever relations to Him we suppose those brethren to have been, it will remain equally mysterious why He passed them over, who were so closely connected with His mother. Still the presumption, that they did not then believe on Him, is one of which it is not easy to divest one's self; and at least may enter as an element into the consideration of the whole subject, beset as it is with uncertainty.

ἀπ' αὐ. τ. ὥρας is probably to be taken literally,—from that time;—so that she was spared the pangs of witnessing what was to follow. If so, John returned again to the Cross, ver. 35.

εἰς τὰ ἴδια need not imply that John had a house in Jerusalem. It would equally apply to his lodging during the feast; only meaning, that henceforth, wherever he was, she was an inmate with him; and certainly that his usual habitation was fixed, and was his own.

Ewald remarks (see Meyer in loc. was for the Apostle in his later y sweet reward to recall vividly ever minute detail,—and for his readers that he alone could have written all

Perhaps some of this time John was absent above. ἵνα ταλ. ἡ γρ.] Various less objections have been raised application of these words to the of the Lord which follows, and at have been made (by Luthardt and among others: see on the other Ewald) to connect them with ταλ. (ταλίσσαι, ἵνα ταλίσωθῃ). That St does use ἵνα . . . as applying to follows, ch. xiv. 31 shews. And so —'that the Scripture might be fulfilled' (not πληρωθῇ),—having view to leave no pre-appointed part of the circumstances of his suffering fulfilled, Jesus, speaking doubtless intense present agony of thirst, but speaking because He so willed it because it was an ordained part of course which He had taken upon said this word. It is beyond the purpose of a note to bring out the many meanings of this most important and glorious word. αἷμα κ. ὕδωρ] The spear perhaps pierced the pericardium or envelope of the heart, in which case a liquid answering the description of ὕδωρ may have flowed with the blood. But the quantity would be so small as scarcely to have been observed. It is hardly possible that the separation of the blood into placenta and serum should so soon have taken place, or that, if it had, it should have been by an observer described as οἷμα καὶ ὕδωρ. It is more probable that the fact, which is here so strongly testified, was a consequence of the extreme exhaustion of the Body of the Redeemer. The medical opinions on the point are very various, and by no means satisfactory. Meyer's note is well worth consulting. His view after all seems to be the safe and true one—that the circumstance is related as a miraculous sign, having deep significance as to the work of the Redeemer, and shewing Him to be more than mortal. It can be no reason against this, that, as Ewald urges, St. John does not here dwell on any such typical significance, nor can I see how, as he maintains, 1 John v. 6 ff. can be understood without reference to this fact: see note there. 35.]

This emphatic affirmation of the fact seems to regard rather the whole incident than the mere outflowing of the blood and water. It was the object of John to shew that the Lord's Body was a real body, and underwent real death. And both these were shewn by what took place: not so much by the phenomenon of the water and blood, as by the infliction of such a wound,—after which, even had not death taken place before, there could not by any possibility be life remaining. So Lücke: except it seems to refer ἰωρακὼς more to the circumstances of the death of

Some have fancied that use of ἐκείνος here, the narrator surely signifies not himself, but third person. But it has been above (see note on ch. vii. 29) that John constantly uses ἐκείνος me emphatically taking up again the subject of the sentence. The πιστεύειν in John makes it probable he lays the weight on the proof reality of the death, as above. ἵνα depends on the three previous clauses, without any parenthesis, final aim of what has gone in order that; not, 'so that.'

36.] 'For'—i.e. as connected with true Messiahship of Christ, 'these were a fulfilment of Scripture.' It is observable that Ps. xxxiii. 20 (LXX) is also referred to;—but no doubt the primary reference is to the Paschal L. Exod., as in refl.: see 1 Cor. v. 7.

37.] LXX, ἐπιβιβάζονται πρὸς μὲν καταρχήσαντο—but the Evs has given the literal and, as now acknowledged (Lücke), true sense of the ἔρχ. The ὕποναι does not refer to Roman soldiers,—but to the regiment in the world, who, at the time the Gospel was written, had begun to fulfil the

Both materials appear to have been pulverized (the wood by scraping or burning?) and strewed in the folds of the linen in which the body was wrapped (De Wette). The quantity is large; but perhaps the whole Body was encased, after the wrapping, in the mixture, and an outer wrapper fastened over all. The proceeding was hurried, on account of the approaching Sabbath: and apparently an understanding entered into with the women, that it should be more completely done after the Sabbath was over. This plentiful application of the aromatic substances may therefore have been made with an intention to prevent the Body, in its lacerated state, from incipient decomposition during the interval.

40.] See ch. xi. 44. Little is known with any certainty, except from these passages, of the Jews' ordinary manner of burying. Winer, Friedlieb.

41.] See note on Matt. ver. 60. The words ἐν τῷ τόπῳ ὅπου ἵσταυρῶθι, are so far in favour of the traditional site of the Holy Sepulchre, that Calvary and the Sepulchre are close together, under the roof of the same church. And those who have found an objection in that circumstance have forgotten this testimony of John.

καὶ οὖν . . .] And therefore given for the purpose—so that the additional particular not here mentioned, that it belonged to Joseph, is almost implied. The newness of the tomb was important, that it should be seen 'neminem præter Jesum, neque Jesum alterius virtute, ut olim circa sepulchrum Elisæi acciderat, resurrexisse' (Lampe): so that (Luthardt) no room might be left for the evasions of unbelief.

42.] τὴν παρασκ. τ. Ἰουδ. seems to indicate clearly the παρασκ. of the Passover, as I have before maintained that the words mean; not the mere day of the week so called, which, as it was by the Christians also in the Apostles' time named παρασκευή, would not be qualified by τῶν Ἰουδ.

The words ὅτι ἐγγ. ἦν τὸ μν. certainly at first sight appear as if John were not aware that the tomb belonged to Joseph; but it is more likely that the thought of asking for the body may have been originally suggested to Joseph by his possessing a tomb close to the place of crucifixion, and so ὅτι ἐγγ. ἦν τὸ μν. may have been the real original reason of the whole proceeding; and John, not anxious to record every particular, may have given it as such.

1. On the chronology of the Resurrection, see note on Matt. 1. I attempt no harmony of counts:—I believe all such attempts to be fruitless;—and I see in their strong corroboration of the true evangelic narratives. It is quite sible that so astounding an event, upon various portions of the body ciples from various quarters and in forms, should not have been related four independent witnesses, in a scattered and fragmentary way in which now find it. In the depth beneath varied surface of narration rests the central fact of the resurrection, moved and immovable. As it was above all other things to which they bore their testimony, so, in their testimony to this, we have the most remarkable of each having faithfully elaborated narrative those particular facts which under his own eye or were reported self by those concerned. Hence the diversity in this portion of the narrative and hence I believe much that is not might be explained, were the facts selves, in their order of occurrence us. Till that is the case, (and I am to believe that it will be one of our most useful employments hereafter, to trace the true harmony of the Holy Gospels His teaching of whom they are the we must be content to walk by faith not by sight. We must also remember this case, that our Evangelist is at his points of narration with a special pose,—to shew us how the belief of his disciples was brought out and confirmed after the unbelief of Israel: cf. 31.

accompanied. Still, probably not. She uses the plural as involving all the disciples in her own feeling of ignorance and of consequent sorrow. So Meyer: and it is more natural to take it thus. One thing we may conclude for certain, that she, for some reason, did not see the vision related in Mt., Mk., and L.

3.] Luke, ver. 12, speaks only of Peter's going. Meyer directs attention to the interchange of aorists and graphic imperfections in this and the following verse.

4—8.] Full of most interesting and characteristic detail. John, probably the younger, outruns Peter:—but when there, reverently (not 'ne pollueretur,' as Wetst.) abstains from entering the sepulchre. The ardent and impetuous Peter goes directly in—John follows—and believes. What can exceed the inner truth of this description? And what is not related, is as full of truth as that which is. For, vv. 6, 7, we seem to hear the very voice of Peter describing to his companion the inner state of the tomb. On σουδ. see reff.

Notice βλέπει, of the cursory glance of John, who did not go in,—θεωρεῖ, of the exhaustive gaze of Peter who did. Notice also that John when he stooped and looked in saw only the ὀθόνια, which seem to have been lying where the Feet were, nearer the entrance, whereas Peter, on going in, saw the σουδάριον which was perhaps deposited further in, near the place of the Head. Nor should, as Meyer observes, the minute distinction of κειμενα τα ὀθόνια in ver. 5 and τα ὀθόνια κειμενα in ver. 6, be altogether overlooked. 8. ἐπίστευσεν] Nothing is said of Peter—did he believe too? think not;—and that John modestly suppresses it. But what did John believe? Was it merely, 'corpus fuisse translatum, ut dixerat Maria?' (Bengel, so August., Erasmus, Grot., Stier, Ebrard.) Surely not; the facts which he saw would prevent this conclusion: nor does John so use the word πιστεύειν. He believed that Jesus was risen from the dead. He received into his mind, embraced with his assent, THE FACT OF THE RESURRECTION, for the first time. He did this, on the ocular testimony before him; for as yet neither of them knew the Scripture, so as to be a priori convinced of the certainty that it would be so. But (see above) Peter does not seem to have as yet received this fact;—accounting probably for what he saw as Mary had done. Lampe beautifully says, 'Concludimus, ab hoc momento in ipsis monumenti tenebris animum Joannis fide salvalica resurrectionis Jesu, tanquam novo quodam orti solis justitiæ radio collustratum fuisse.' 10.] Luke has the very same expression, ἀπῆλθεν πρὸς αὐτόν. This is remarkable, as he evidently has a fragment of the same incident.

11.] She had come with them, but more slowly. εἰστήκει, was standing, strictly imperfect; not 'had been standing.'

12.] From what has been said above, my readers will not expect me to compare the angelic appearances in the four Gospels. What wonder, if the heavenly hosts were variously as visible on this great day, when morning stars sang together, and sons of God shouted for joy? can be more accurate in detail the description of the vision of Mary? word was no doubt carefully relate Apostle, and as carefully recorded all is significant: they are in cause from the world of light: as not defending, but peacefully the Body: at the Head and the Body of the Lord was from foot in the charge of His Father His servants. (Luthardt.) 13 again the finest psychological touches derides the narrative. The other (Mark, ver. 5. Luke, ver. 5) was at the vision; but now Mary, have one thought or desire, to recover Body of her Lord (τὸν κύριόν μου) no fear.

The angels doubt proceeding further to assure her did the women before:—but this is off by the appearance of the Lord or perhaps by Mary's turning away 14.] ἑστράφη—having her attracted by the consciousness of a present near her—not perhaps approach of Jesus.  init. We need not surely enquire too minutely, why she did not know Him.
 The fact may be psychologically accounted for—she did not expect Him to be there, and was wholly preoccupied with other thoughts: or, as Dräseke (cited by Stier, vii. 12, edn. 2) says, 'Her tears wove a veil, which concealed Him who stood before her. The seeking after the Dead prevents us from seeing the Living.'

^{15.}] The same kind of repetition by the Lord of what the angel had before said is found in Matt. xxviii. 7—10.
 It is idle to enquire why she thought Him to be the gardener (see specimens of such speculations in Lücke and Stier in loc.):
 but I may once for all observe that we must believe the clothing of His risen Body to have been that which He pleased to assume; not earthly clothing, but perhaps some semblance of it. Certainly, in this case, He was clothed;—or she must at once have recognized Him.
 But see on στραφεῖσα below.

καὶ γὰρ αὐτ. ἀρῶ] She forgets her

^{16.}] With one word, and that one word that tone doubtless in which her soul had been so often summoned to receive divine knowledge and precious comfort.

στραφεῖσα] seems to imply that she had ραββουνί] See ref. γῆρ, either my

 (from διδάσκαλε) to be the case here.

That she gives way to no impassioned exclamations, but pours out her satisfaction and joy in this one word, is also according to the deepest psychological truth. The addition of καὶ προειδραμιν ἄφασθαι αὐτοῦ (see digest: so also, but with προειδραμιν, the cursives 13. 346) is an explanatory gloss to μή μου ἅπτου
 —but doubtless a correct one. 'It was the former name with which He called her: His former appellation in which she replied; and now she seeks to renew the former intercourse.' (Luthardt.)

^{17.}] The connexion between the prohibition and its reason is difficult, and has been very variously given. See a complete discussion of the exegetical literature of the passage in Stier, vi. 640—667. The sense seems to me to be connected with some gesture of the nature alluded to in the gloss above quoted, but indicating that she believed she had now gotten Him again, never to be parted from Him. This gesture He reproves as unsuited to the time, and the nature of His present appearance.

At ubi ad Patrem ascendero, veniet tempus quum frui mea amicitia perfectissime poteris, non terrestri contactu, sed tali qui loco illi, i. e. caelo conveniat, spirituali.’ Grotius. With this my view nearly agrees, not confining (as indeed neither does he) the latter enjoyment to is caelo, but understanding it to have begun here below. So Leo the Great, Sermon lxxiv. (al. lxxii.) 4, p. 295: ‘Hinc illud est quod post resurrectionem suam Dominus Mariae Magdalenae personam Ecclesiae gerenti cum ad contactum ipsius properaret accedere dicit; Noli me tangere, nondum enim ascendi ad Patrem meum: hoc est, nolo ut ad me corporaliter venias, nec ut me sensu carnis agnoscas: ad sublimiora te differo, majora tibi preparo: cum ad Patrem ascendero, tunc me perfectius veriusque palpabis, apprehensura quod non tangis, et creditura quod non cernis.’

Nor did this affect the truth of that resurrection Body, any more than his withdrawing himself from mortal sight occasionally affected the truth of his fleshly Body. Both were done by that supernatural Power dwelling in Him, by which his other miracles were wrought. It seems to have been the normal condition of his fleshly Body, to be visible to mortal eyes:—of his risen Body, not to be. But both these He could suspend when He pleased, without affecting the substance or truth of either. ἔδειξεν [τ. φ. τ. Ἰου.] This was natural enough;—the bitter hatred of the Jews (both people and rulers) to their Master,—and his own prophetic announcements,—would raise in them a dread of incipient persecution, now that He was removed. ἦλθεν not, by ordinary approach; nor, through the closed doors;—nor in any visible manner;—but (subjectively, of Himself) the word describes that unseen arrival among them which preceded His becoming visible to them. ἔστη εἰς τ. μ.] Compare Luke, ver. 36, ἰσθῆν ἐν μυστῇ. The εἰς, as in ch. xxi. 4, denotes the coming, and standing, is one—the standing without motion thither, which in ordinary cases would be standing as the result of motion thither;—so that in this case ἔστη itself is the verb of motion. εἰς τ. μ.] See on Luke ver. 36, and ch. xiv. 27. 20.] answers to Luke, ver. 39. ἐχάρησαν] The first and partial fulfilment of ch. xvi. 20—22: see notes there. The disciples seem to have handed Him: see

Luke, ver. 39; 1 John i. 1, and below, ver. 25.

21.] 'Peace be with you' is solemnly repeated, as the introduction of the sending which follows. The ministers and disciples of the Lord are messengers of peace. This view is more natural than that of Euthym: ἐπὶ πολλῆς χαρᾶς ὡς εἰδὼς θορυβουῦντας καταστέλλει, ἵνα προσέχωσιν οἱς μέλλει ἰπεῖν. καθὼς] He confirms and grounds their Apostleship on the present glorification of Himself, whose Apostleship (Heb. iii. 1) on earth was now ended, but was to be continued by this sending forth of them. This commission was not now first given them, but now first fully assured to them: and their sending forth by Him their glorified Head, was to be, in character and process, like that of Himself by the Father.

22.] To understand this verse as the outpouring of the Spirit, the fulfilment of the promise of the Comforter, is against all consistency, and most against John himself:—see ch. xvi. 7, and ch. vii. 39. To understand it rightly, we have merely to recur to that great key to the meaning of so many dark passages of Scripture, the manifold and gradual unfolding of promise and prophecy in their fulfilment. The presence of the Lord among them now was a slight and temporary fulfilment of His promise of returning to them; and so the imparting of the Spirit now, was a symbol and foretaste of that which they should receive at Pentecost:—just as, to mount a step higher, that itself, in its present abiding with us, is but the first-fruits and pledge

besides, I incline, with Stier (vii. 117, edn. 2), to think that it could not have been accidentally (Lücke), nor 'negotio aliquo occupatus' (Grot.). On such a day, and in such a man, such an absence must have been designed. Perhaps he had abandoned hope;—the strong evidence of his senses having finally convinced him that the pierced side and wounded hands betokened such a death that revivification was impossible.

25.] He probably does not name the Feet, merely because the Hands and Side would more naturally offer themselves to his examination than the Feet, to which he must stoop. He requires no more than had been granted to the rest: but he had their testimony in addition, and therefore ample ground for faith to rest on. Olshausen calls him the 'Rationalist among the Apostles.' Meyer lays some stress on τόπον being used (see var. readd.) instead of τύπον in the second place: 'τύπος videtur, τόπος impletur,' Grot.;—he would see the τύπος, but place his finger in the τόπος. Valeat quantum: but meantime the authority is but weak, and the mistake so obvious, that we can hardly with any safety adopt τόπον.

26.] There is not the least reason for supposing, with Olshausen, that this appearance was in Galilee. The whole narrative points out the same place as before.

The eight days' interval is the first testimony of the recurring day of the resurrection being commemorated by the disciples:—but, it must be owned, a weak one;—for in all probability they had been thus assembled every day during the interval. It forms however an interesting opening of the history of THE LORD'S DAY, that the Lord Himself should have thus selected and honoured it.

27.] Our Lord says nothing of the τύπος τῶν ἥλων—He does not recall the malice of his enemies.

The words imply that the marks were no scars, but the veritable wounds themselves;—that in His side being large enough for a hand to be thrust into it. This of itself would shew that the resurrection Body was bloodless. It is φίρε κ. ἴδε in the case of the hands, which were exposed—but merely φίρε κ. βάλε in the case of the side, which was clothed. So Meyer: but query?

μὴ γ. ἀπιστ.] not merely, 'Do not any longer disbelieve in My Resurrection';—but Be not (do not become)—as applied generally to the spiritual life, and the reception of God's truth—faithless, but believing. The E. V. is excellent.

That Thomas did not apply his finger or his hand, is evident from ὅτι ἰωρακάς με below.

28.] The Socinian view, that these words,

ὁ κ. μου κ. ὁ θεός μου, are merely an exclamation, is refuted, (1) By the fact that no such exclamations were in use
 among the Jews. (2) By the εἰπεν αὐτῷ.
 (3) By the impossibility of referring ὁ
 κύριός μου to another than Jesus: see ver.
 13. (4) By the N. T. usage of expressing the vocative by the nom. with an article.
 (5) By the utter psychological absurdity of such a supposition: that one just convinced of the presence of Him whom he deeply loved, should, instead of addressing
 Him, break out into an irrelevant cry.
 (6) By the further absurdity of supposing that if such were the case, the Apostle
 John, who of all the sacred writers most constantly keeps in mind the object for which he is writing, should have recorded
 any thing so beside that object. (7) By
 the intimate conjunction of πεπίστευκας
 —see below. Dismissing it therefore,
 we observe that this is the highest confession of faith which has yet been made;
 —and that it shews that (though not yet fully) the meaning of the previous confessions of His being 'the Son of God'
 was understood. Thus John, in the very close of his Gospel (see on vv. 30, 31)
 iterates the testimony with which he began it—to the Godhead of the Word who became flesh: and by this closing confe-
 sion, shews how the testimony of Jesus to Himself had gradually deepened and exalted the Apostles' conviction, from the time when they knew Him only as ὁ υἱὸς
 τοῦ Ἰωσήφ (ch. i. 46), till now when He is acknowledged as their LORD and their God.

²⁹] The εἶτι ἑώρ. blames the slowness and required ground of the faith:
 the πεπίστευκας recognizes and commends
 the soundness of that faith just confessed.

Meyer remarks on the perf. πι-

 now believest," and the aor. ἰδόντες πιστεύσαντες, which are not usit

 Wonderful indeed, and rich in blessing us who have not seen Him, is this, closing word of the Gospel. For t

CHAP. XXI. 1—23.] THE APPENDIX. THE GLIMPSE INTO THE FUTURE. And herein, 1—8. The significant draught of fishes. I reserve the remarks on this chapter to the end, thereby better to put the reader in possession of the evidence which I shall there gather up into one, but which will present itself as we go on. I will only state here, that whether written by John himself or not, it is evidently an appendix to the Gospel, which latter has already concluded by a formal review of its contents and object at ch. xx. 30, 31.

1.] μετὰ ταῦτα, compare ch. v. 1; vi. 1, at a subsequent time. ἑφάν. ἑαυτ.] This expression is nowhere else used by John of the Lord's appearances, but only in Mark xvi. 12, 14. We have however φανίρωσον σαυρόν, ch. vii. 4; and ἰφ. τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ, ch. ii. 11; and the passive of φανίρω is very usual with him. The use of the verb here indicates that the usual state of the Lord at this time was not manifestation, but invisibility to them.

ἐπὶ τῆς θ.] elsewhere, see ref., used by John with a dativo in this sense.

The expression indicates the locality, not the manner, of the appearance; on, i. e. on the shore of the sea of Galilee: see note on Matt. xiv. 25.

ἑφάν. 82 οὕτως must not be too rashly cited as unlike John's style. We must remember that, in adding an appendix, expressions of this kind would occur, which the narrative itself would not contain.

2.] Nathanael is named by John only: see ch. i. 46 ff.: Thomas also by John only, except in the catalogues of the Apostles.

The junction of ἀπὸ with a proper name is in John's style: see ch. i. 46; xi. 1; xix. 38.

οἱ τοῦ Ζεβ. are nowhere else named by John;—they may however be here mentioned as in reminiscence of the draught of fishes which occurred before: see Luke v. 1 ff.

ἐκ τ. π. αὐτοῦ δύο.] The same words occur ch. i. 36, with reference to John the Baptist. Who these were does not appear. Probably (as Luthardt) some two not named in the Gospel, and therefore not specified in its appendix.

3.] The disciples returned to their occupation of fishing, probably as a means of livelihood, during the time which the Lord had appointed them in Galilee between the feasts of the Passover and Pentecost. This seems to be the first proposal of so employing themselves.

καὶ ἡμεῖς.] See ch. xi. 16. ἐξῆλθ.] from the house where they were together.

‘Do not thus—for I am not yet restored finally to you in the body—I have yet to ascend to the Father.’ This implies in the background another and truer touching, when He should have ascended to the Father. ‘Vis me tangere, Maria; vis omnino frui amicitia mea: id nunc non licet, quum tantum οικονομικῶς, ad fidem vestram roborandam me do conspiciendum. At ubi ad Patrem ascendero, veniet tempus quum frui mea amicitia perfectissime poteris, non terrestri contactu, sed tali qui loco illi, i. e. coelo conveniat, spirituali.’ Grotius. With this my view nearly agrees, not confining (as indeed neither does he) the latter enjoyment to is coelo, but understanding it to have begun here below. So Leo the Great, Serm. lxxiv. (al. lxxii.) 4, p. 295: “Hinc illud est quod post resurrectionem suam Dominus Mariae Magdalene personam Ecclesiae gerenti cum ad contactum ipsius properaret accedere dicit; Noli me tangere, nondum enim ascendi ad Patrem meum: hoc est, nolo ut ad me corporaliter venias, nec ut me sensu carnis agnoscas: ad sublimiora te differo, majora tibi praeparo: cum ad Patrem ascendero, tunc me perfectius veriusque palpabis, apprehensura quod non tangis, et creditura quod non cernis.” The two renderings of ἐπὶ to be guarded against are, (1) a laying hold of to retain (= μη με κρατει), (2) a laying hold of to worship (ἐκάρησαν αὐτοῦ τοῦ πόδας Matt. xxviii. 9). Neither of these senses can be extracted from the word without forcing.

any approach,—the Lord rendered himself visible to his disciples. Nor did this affect the truth of that resurrection Body, any more than his withdrawing himself from mortal sight occasionally affected the truth of his fleshly Body. Both were done by that supernatural Power dwelling in Him, by which his other miracles were wrought. It seems to have been the normal condition of his fleshly Body, to be visible to mortal eyes:—of his risen Body, not to be. But both these He could suspend when He pleased, without affecting the substance or truth of either. ἦλθεν τ. φ. τ. 'Ιου.] This was natural enough;—the bitter hatred of the Jews (both people and rulers) to their Master,—and his own prophetic announcements,—would raise in them a dread of incipient persecution, now that He was removed. ἦλθεν] not, by ordinary approach; nor, through the closed doors;—nor in any visible manner;—but (subjectively, of Himself) the word describes that unseen arrival among them which preceded His becoming visible to them. ἔστη εἰς τ. μ.] Compare Luke, ver. 36, ἔστη ἐν μέσῳ. The εἰς, as in ch. xxi. 4, denotes the coming, and standing, is one—the standing without motion thither, which in ordinary cases would be standing as the result of motion thither;—so that in this case ἔστη itself is the verb of motion. εἰρ. ὑμ.] See on Luke ver. 36, and ch. xiv. 27. 20.] answers to Luke, ver. 39. ἐχάρησαν] The first and partial fulfilment of ch. xvi. 20—22: see notes there. The disciples seem to have huddled Him: see is solemnly repeated, as the introduction of the sending which follows. The ministers and disciples of the Lord are messengers of peace. This view is more natural than that of Euthym.: ὡς πολλὰς χαρὰς ὡς εἰκὸς θορυβούντας καταστίλλει, ἵνα προσέχῳσιν οἱς μέλλει ἱρεῖν. καθὼς] He confirms and grounds their Apostleship on the present glorification of Himself, whose Apostleship (Heb. iii. 1) on earth was now ended, but was to be continued by this sending forth of them. This commission was not now first given them, but now first fully assured to them: and their sending forth by Him their glorified Head, was to be, in character and process, like that of Himself by the Father. 22.] To understand this verse as the outpouring of the Spirit, the fulfilment of the promise of the Comforter, is against all consistency, and most against John himself:—see ch. xvi. 7, and ch. vii. 39. To understand it rightly, we have merely to recur to that great key to the meaning of so many dark passages of Scripture, the manifold and gradual unfolding of promise and prophecy in their fulfilment. The presence of the Lord among them now was a slight and temporary fulfilment of His promise of returning to them; and so the imparting of the Spirit now, was a symbol and foretaste of that which they should receive at Pentecost:—just as, to mount a step higher, that itself, in its present abiding with us, is but the first-fruits and pledge

Luke, ver. 39; 1 John i. 1, and below, ver. 25. 21.] 'Peace be with you'

(Rom. viii. 23. 2 Cor. i. 22) of the fulness which we shall hereafter inherit. 'The relation of this saying to the effusion of the Spirit is the same which chap. iii. bears to Baptism, chap. vi. to the Lord's Supper, chap. xvii. 1 to the Ascension, &c.' (Luthardt.) Further: this giving of the Spirit was not the Spirit's personal imparting of Himself to them, but only a partial instilling of His influence. He proceeds forth in His work (as in His essence) from the Father and the Son: this breathing of His influence was an imparting of Him from the Son in His risen Body, but that Body had not yet been received up, without which union of the God-manhood of the Son to the glory of the Father the Holy Spirit would not come.

What was now conferred is plain from our ver. 23—by which authority to discern spirits and pronounce on them is re-assured (see Matt. xviii. 18)—and from Luke, ver. 45, by which a discerning of the mind of the Spirit is given to them. We find instances of both these gifts being exercised by Peter in Acts i., in his assertion of the sense of Scripture, and his judgment of Judas. Both these however were only temporary and imperfect. That no formal gifts of Apostleship were now formally conferred, is plain by the absence of Thomas, who in that case would be no apostle in the same sense in which the rest were.

ἐνφύσησεν] (see ref.) was the word expressing the act of God in the original infusion of the spirit of life into man. This act is now by God incarnate repeated, sacramentally (see λάβετε, Matt. xxvi. 26 ||), representing the infusion of the new life, of which He is become by his glorified Humanity the source to his members: see Job xxxiii. 4; Ps. xxxiii. 6; 1 Cor. xv. 45.

23.] The present meaning of these words has been spoken of above. They reach forward however beyond that, and extend the grant which they re-assure to all ages of the Church. The words, closely considered, amount this: that with the gift and real participation of the Holy Spirit, comes the victory, and therefore the knowledge of sin, of righteousness, and judgment;—this knowledge becomes more perfect, more men are filled with the Holy Spirit. Since this is so, they who are pre-eminent filled with His presence are pre-eminent gifted with the discernment of sin and penance in others, and hence by the Lord's appointment authorized to pronounce on sin and the contrary. The Apostles had this in an especial manner, and by full indwelling of the Spirit were enabled to discern the hearts of men, and to pronounce on that discernment: see Act 1—11; viii. 21; xiii. 9. And this belongs to the Church in all ages, and specially to those who by legitimate appointment are set to minister in the Church of Christ: not by successive delegation from the Apostles,—of which fiction find in the N. T. no trace,—but by transmission from Christ, the Bestower of Spirit for their office, when orderly legitimately conferred upon them by various Churches. Not however to be exclusively,—though for decency and order it is expedient that the outward and for declaration should be so:—but in proportion as any disciple shall have been filled with the Holy Spirit of wisdom, is inner discernment, the επισκοπή, his κρατεῖν here (see ref.) corresponds to δέξασθαι in Matt. xvi. 19 (see the distinct there); xviii. 18, ἀφίεναι τοῦ σπ. 24—28.] He proves Himself to His disciples to be Lord and God, to be believed on by them, though not seen. Thomas's doubt and its removal. Peculiar to John. 24.] οὐκ ἦν—for what reason does not appear. Euthym. says, εἰδὼς γὰρ αὐτὸν μετὰ τὸ διασκοπισθῆναι τοὺς μαθητὰς . . . μήκων συνελθεῖν αὐτοῖς. But this would not agree with Luke xiv. 33: 1

25 ἔλεγον οὖν αὐτῷ οἱ ἄλλοι μαθηταὶ Ἐωράκαμεν τὸν κύριον. ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς Ἐὰν μὴ ἴδω ἐν ταῖς χερσὶν αὐτοῦ τὸν τύπον τῶν ἥλων καὶ βάλῃ τὸν δάκτυλόν μου εἰς τὸν τύπον τῶν ἥλων καὶ βάλῃ μου τὴν χεῖρα εἰς τὴν πλευρὰν αὐτοῦ, οὐ μὴ πιστεύσω. 26 Καὶ μεθ' ἡμέρας ὀκτὼ πάλιν ἦσαν ἔσω οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ, καὶ Θωμᾶς μετ' αὐτῶν. ἔρχεται ὁ Ἰησοῦς τῶν θυρῶν κεκλεισμένων, καὶ ἔστη εἰς τὸ μέσον καὶ εἶπεν Εἰρήνη ὑμῖν. 27 εἶτα λέγει τῷ Θωμᾷ Φέρε τὸν δάκτυλόν σου ὧδε καὶ ἴδε τὰς χεῖράς μου, καὶ φέρε τὴν χεῖρά σου καὶ βάλε εἰς τὴν πλευράν μου, καὶ μὴ γίνου ἄπιστος ἀλλὰ πιστός. 28 ἀπεκρίθη Θωμᾶς καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ

besides, I incline, with Stier (vii. 117, edn. 2), to think that it could not have been accidentally (Lücke), nor 'negotio aliquo occupatus' (Grot.). On such a day, and in such a man, such an absence must have been designed. Perhaps he had abandoned hope;—the strong evidence of his senses having finally convinced him that the pierced side and wounded hands betokened such a death that revivification was impossible.

25.] He probably does not name the Feet, merely because the Hands and Side would more naturally offer themselves to his examination than the Feet, to which he must stoop. He requires no more than had been granted to the rest: but he had their testimony in addition, and therefore ample ground for faith to rest on. Olshausen calls him the 'Rationalist among the Apostles.' Meyer lays some stress on τόπον being used (see var. readd.) instead of τύπον in the second place: 'τύπος videtur, τόπος impletur,' Grot.;—he would see the τύπος, but place his finger in the τόπος. Valeat quantum: but meantime the authority is but weak, and the mistake so obvious, that we can hardly with any safety adopt τόπον.

26.] There is not the least reason for supposing, with Olshausen, that this appearance was in Galilee. The whole narrative points out

the same place as before.

The eight days' interval is the first testimony of the recurring day of the resurrection being commemorated by the disciples:—but, it must be owned, a weak one;—for in all probability they had been thus assembled every day during the interval. It forms however an interesting opening of the history of THE LORD'S DAY, that the Lord Himself should have thus selected and honoured it.

27.] Our Lord says nothing of the τύπος τῶν ἥλων—He does not recall the malice of his enemies. The words imply that the marks were no scars, but the veritable wounds themselves;—that in His side being large enough for a hand to be thrust into it. This of itself would shew that the resurrection Body was bloodless. It is φίρε κ. ἴδε in the case of the hands, which were exposed—but merely φίρε κ. βάλε in the case of the side, which was clothed. So Meyer: but query? μὴ γ. ἀπιστ. not merely, 'Do not any longer disbelieve in my Resurrection';—but Be not (do not become)—as applied generally to the spiritual life, and the reception of God's truth—faithless, but believing. The E. V. is excellent. That Thomas did not apply his finger or his hand, is evident from ὅτι ἰωρακάς με below.

28.] The Socinian view, that these words,

ὁ κ. μου κ. ὁ θεός μου, are merely an exclamation, is refuted, (1) By the fact
 that no such exclamations were in use
 among the Jews. (2) By the εἰπεν αὐτῷ.
 (3) By the impossibility of referring ὁ
 κύριός μου to another than Jesus : see ver.
 13. (4) By the N. T. usage of expressing
 the vocative by the nom. with an article.
 (5) By the utter psychological absurdity of
 such a supposition : that one just convinced of the presence of Him whom he
 deeply loved, should, instead of addressing
 Him, break out into an irrelevant cry.
 (6) By the further absurdity of supposing
 that if such were the case, the Apostle
 John, who of all the sacred writers most
 constantly keeps in mind the object for
 which he is writing, should have recorded
 any thing so beside that object. (7) By
 the intimate conjunction of πεπίστευκας
 —see below. Dismissing it therefore,
 we observe that this is the highest confession of faith which has yet been made ;
 —and that it shews that (though not yet fully) the meaning of the previous confessions of His being 'the Son of God'
 was understood. Thus John, in the very close of his Gospel (see on vv. 30, 31)
 iterates the testimony with which he began it—to the Godhead of the Word who became flesh : and by this closing confession, shews how the testimony of Jesus to Himself had gradually deepened and exalted the Apostles' conviction, from the time when they knew Him only as ὁ υἱὸς
 τοῦ Ἰωσήφ (ch. i. 46), till now when He
 is acknowledged as their Lord and their God.

29.] The εἶτι δῶρ. blames the
 slowness and required ground of the faith :
 the πεπίστευκας recognizes and commends
 the soundness of that faith just confessed.

Meyer remarks on the perf. πεπίστευκας, "thou hast become believing as now believest," and the aor. ἰδόντες αὐτῷ πιστεύσαντες, which are not usitati (an usage never occurring in the N. T.
 but indicate the state of those described from the time of the μακαρίων predicated of them, "who never saw, and yet became believers." The aorists, as often in su-sentences (see a remarkable coinciden-Luke i. 45), indicate the present state those spoken of, grounded in the past.
 Wonderful indeed, and rich in blessing fus who have not seen Him, is this, t-closing word of the Gospel. For the words cannot apply to the remaining Te-they, like Thomas, had seen and believed. 'All the appearances of the for days,' says Stier (vii. 139, edn. 2), 'we mere preparations for the believing witout seeing.' On the record of them, I now believe : see 1 Pet. i. 8.

CHAP. XXI. 1—23.] THE APPENDIX. THE GLIMPSE INTO THE FUTURE. And herein, 1—8. The significant draught of fishes. I reserve the remarks on this chapter to the end, thereby better to put the reader in possession of the evidence which I shall there gather up into one, but which will present itself as we go on. I will only state here, that whether written by John himself or not, it is evidently an appendix to the Gospel, which latter has already concluded by a formal review of its contents and object at ch. xx. 30, 31.

1.] μετὰ ταῦτα, compare ch. v. 1; vi. 1, at a subsequent time. ἐφάν. ἑαυτ.] This expression is nowhere else used by John of the Lord's appearances, but only in Mark xvi. 12, 14. We have however φανίρωσον σιαυρόν, ch. vii. 4; and φ. ρήν δόξαν αὐτοῦ, ch. ii. 11; and the passive of φανίρωω is very usual with him. The use of the verb here indicates that the usual state of the Lord at this time was not manifestation, but invisibility to them.

ἐν τῇ θ.] elsewhere, see reff., used by John with a dative in this sense.

The expression indicates the locality, not the manner, of the appearance; on, i. e. on the shore of the sea of Galilee: see note on Matt. xiv. 25.

ἐφάν. δὲ οὕτως must not be too rashly cited as unlike John's style. We must remember that, in adding an appendix, expressions of this kind would occur, which the narrative itself would not contain.

2.] Nathanael is named by John only: see ch. i. 46 ff.: Thomas also by John only, except in the catalogues of the Apostles.

The junction of ἀπό with a proper name is in John's style: see ch. i. 46; xi. 1; xix. 38.

οἱ τοῦ Ζεβ. are nowhere else named by John;—they may however be here mentioned as in reminiscence of the draught of fishes which occurred before: see Luke v. 1 ff.

ἐκ τ. π. αὐτοῦ δύο] The same words occur ch. i. 36, with reference to John the Baptist. Who these were does not appear. Probably (as Luthardt) some two not named in the Gospel, and therefore not specified in its appendix.

3.] The disciples returned to their occupation of fishing, probably as a means of livelihood, during the time which the Lord had appointed them in Galilee between the feasts of the Passover and Pentecost. This seems to be the first proposal of so employing themselves.

here is clearly not that of all appearances of Jesus up to this time, for that to Mary Magdalen is not reckoned; but only those to the disciples,—i. e. any considerable number of them together. This one internal trait of consistency speaks much for the authenticity and genuineness of the addition.

ἐγερθεῖς, the participle is not found elsewhere in John, but the participial construction is found in ch. iv. 54.

Without agreeing with all the allegorical interpretations of the Fathers, I cannot but see much depth and richness of meaning in this whole narrative. The Lord appears to His disciples, busied about their occupation for their daily bread; speaks and acts in a manner wonderfully similar to His words and actions on a former memorable occasion, when we know that by their toiling long and taking nothing, but at his word enclosing a multitude of fishes, was set forth what should befall them as fishers of men. Can we miss that application at this far more important epoch of their apostolic mission? Besides, He graciously provides for their present wants, and invites them to be His guests: why, but to shew them that in their work hereafter they should never want but He would provide? And as connected with the parable, Matt. xiii. 47 ff., has the net enclosing a great multitude and yet not broken, no meaning? Has the, 'taking the bread and giving to them, and the fish likewise' no meaning, which so closely binds together the miraculous feeding, and the institution of the Lord's Supper, with their future meetings in His Name and round His Table? Any one who recognizes the teaching character of the acts of the Lord, can hardly cast all such applications from him;—and those who do not, have yet the first rudiments of the Gospels to learn.

15—23.] The calling, and its prospect. 15. Ὅτε οὖν ἦρπ.] There appears to have been nothing said during the meal. Surely every word would have been recorded. One great object of this appearance observes Stier, certainly was the confirmation, and encouragement of the 'fish of men,' in his apostolic office.

Σίμων Ἰωάννου] A reminiscence probably of his own name and parentage, as distinguished from his apostolic name honour, Cephas, or Peter, see ch. i. 4. Thus we have Σ. βαρισηβα, Matt. xvi. 1 connected with the mention of his natural state of flesh and blood, which had revealed to him the great truth just confessed—and Luke xxii. 31, 'Simon, Simon,' when he is reminded of his natural weakness. See also Mark xiv. 37, a Matt. xvii. 25, where the significance is not so plain.

πλεον τούτων] more than these thy fellow-disciples, comp. Matt. xxvi. 33; Mark xiv. 29, 'Thou, all should be offended, yet not I.' The John does not record this saying, making no difficulty here; nor does it against the genuineness of this appendix to the Gospel. The narrator tells that which he heard the Lord say, and tells it faithfully and literally. That coincides with what Peter is related to have said elsewhere, is a proof of its authenticity, not of the connection, of the two accounts.

τούτων has been strangely enough understood (Whitby, Bolten) of the fish, or the 'employment and furniture of a fisherman':—Olshausen sees a reference to the pre-eminence given to Peter, Matt. xvi. 19,—and regards the words as implying that on that account he really did love Jesus more than the rest;—but surely this is most improbable, and the other explanation the most likely or true one. Perhaps there is a slight reference to his present just-awakened zeal, in leaping from the ship first to meet the Lord. 'Has thy past conduct to truly borne out thy former and present warmth of love to Me above these fellows?' 'Mira Christi sapientia, tam paucis vocibus efficit, ut Petrus et sibi satisfaceret, quem ter negaverat, et collegis quibus se prætulerat;—exemplum dans disciplinæ ecclesiasticæ.' Grot.

Peter's answer shews that he understood the question as above. He says nothing of the πλῖον τούτων—but dropping all comparison of himself with others, humbly refers to the Searcher of hearts the genuineness of his love, however the past may seem to have called it in question.

The distinction between ἀγαπᾶν and φιλεῖν must not here be lost sight of, nor must we superficially say with Grotius, 'Promiscue hic usurpavit Johannes ἀγαπᾶν et φιλεῖν ut mox βόσκειν et ποιμαίνειν (see below). Neque hic quærendæ sunt subtilitates.' If so, why do the Lord's two first questions contain ἀγαπᾷς while Peter's answers have φιλῶ—whereas the third time the question and answer both have φιλεῖν? This does not look like accident.

The distinction seems to be that ἀγαπᾶν is more used of that reverential love, grounded on high graces of character, which is borne towards God and man by the child of God;—whereas φιλεῖν expresses more the personal love of human affection. Peter therefore uses a less exalted word, and one implying a consciousness of his own weakness, but a persuasion and deep feeling of personal love. (Hence it will be seen that in the sublimest relations, where, all perfections existing, love can only be personal, φιλεῖν only can be used, see ch. v. 20.) Then in the third question, the Lord adopts the word of Peter's answer, the closer to press the meaning of it home to him.

The σὺ οἶδας, the two first times, seems to refer to the Lord's personal knowledge of Peter's heart—in His having given him that name, ch. i. 43, in Matt. xvi. 17; Luke xxii. 31, and the announcement of his denial of Him. The last time, he widens this assertion 'Thou knowest me,' into 'Thou knowest all things,' being grieved at the repetition of a question which brought this Omniscience so painfully to his mind.

βόσκει τ. ἀρν. μου] This and the following answers of the Lord can hardly be regarded as the reinstating of Peter in his apostolic office, for there is no record of his ever having lost it: but as a further and higher setting forth of it than that first one Matt. iv. 18 ff.—both as belonging to all of them on the present occasion, and as tending to comfort Peter's own mind after his fall, and reassure him of his holding the same place among the Apostles as before, owing to the gracious forgiveness of his Lord.

We can hardly with any deep insight into the text hold βόσκειν and ποιμ. to be synonymous (Grot. above, Lücke, De Wette, Trench), or ἀρνία, πρόβατα, and προβάτια. The sayings of the Lord have not surely been so carelessly reported as this would assume. Every thing here speaks for a gradation of meaning. The variety of reading certainly makes it difficult to point out exactly the steps of that gradation, and unnecessary to follow the various interpreters in their assignment of them: but that there is such, may be seen from Isa. xl. 11: 1 John ii. 12, 13. Perhaps the feeding of the lambs was the furnishing the apostolic testimony of the resurrection and facts of the Lord's life on earth to the first converts; the shepherding or ruling the sheep, the subsequent government of the Church as shewn forth in the early part of the Acts: the feeding of the πρόβατια, the choicest, the loved of the flock, the furnishing the now maturer Church of Christ with the wholesome food of the doctrine contained in his Epistles. But those must strangely miss the whole sense, who dream of an exclusive primatial power here granted or confirmed to him. A sufficient refutation of this silly idea, if it needed any other than the ἐναντίον of this passage, is found in the συμποισβί-τερος of 1 Pet. v. 1, where he refers apparently to the very first charge; see note on Matt. xvi. 17 ff. "Illud, 'plus his' (πλῖον τούτων), indicio est, Petrum hic restitui in locum suum, quem amiserat per abnegationem (but see above) simulque quiddam ei præ condiscipulis tribui, sed nihil a quo ceteri excludantur. Nam sane etiam hi amabant Jesum. Desinat tandem hoc ad se, et ad se unum rapere, qui nec amat nec pascit, sed depascit, per successionis Petrinæ simulationem. Non

is the ἄλλος—who was to strengthen him for his work (ζῶσει),—that he was to stretch out his hands in the sense of his own weakness, not merely in the feebleness of old age (in prayer?), and finally this ἄλλος, the Lord whom he served, would carry him whither he would not, i. e. to a death of martyrdom. But this says nothing of πολεῖ θανάτῳ, on which the stress evidently is, and which Bleek, while he recognizes, endeavours to get rid of by strangely supposing the idea to have arisen after the death of Peter.

19.] This remark is entirely in John's manner, see ch. ii. 21; vi. 6; vii. 39; xii. 33; as may be also the δοξάζειν τ. θ. used of such a death, see ch. xiii. 31 f; xvii. 1. ἀκολουθεῖ μοι.] Not to be understood I think of any present gesture of the Lord calling Peter aside;—but, from the next verse, followed perhaps by a motion of Peter towards Him, in which John joined. The words seem to be a plain reference to ch. xiii. 36;—and the following,—a following through the Cross to glory;—see Matt. xvi. 24; Mark x. 21. Now, however, ἀρας τὸν σταυρόν is omitted. He had made this so plain, that it needed not expressing. There was also a forcible reminding Peter of the first time when he had heard this command on the same shore, Matt. iv. 19.

20.] The details necessary to complete the narrative are obscure, and only hinted at in the background. It seems that Peter either was at the time of the foregoing conversation walking with Jesus, and turned round and saw John following,—or that he moved towards Him on the termination of it (but certainly not from a misunderstanding of the words ἀκολ. μοι, see ver. 21). I can hardly conceive Him moving away on uttering these words, and summoning Peter away in private. It seems in the highest degree unnatural. The description of the disciple whom Jesus loved is evidently inserted to justify his following, and is a strong token of John's hand having written this chapter; see ch. xiii. 23.

VOL. I.

21.] Peter's question shews that he had rightly understood the Lord's prophecy respecting him. He now wishes to know what should befall his friend and colleague,—ἀποδιδοῦς αὐτῷ τὴν ἀμοιβήν (for his similar service in ch. xiii. 23 just referred to) καὶ νομίσας αὐτὸν βούλεισθαι ἰρωτᾶν τὰ καθ' αὐτόν, εἰτα μὴ θαρρύν, αὐτὸς ἀνείλετο τὴν ἰρωτήσιν. Chrysost. (Stier vii. 198, edn. 2.) This was not mere idle curiosity, but that longing which we all feel for our friends; of which Bengel says,—Facilius nos ipsos voluntati divinæ impendimus, quam curiositatem circa alios, æquales præsertim aut suppres, deponimus. οὐκ ἀκολουθήσει σοι; οὐ τὴν αὐτὴν ἡμῖν ὁδὸν τοῦ θανάτου βαδίζετα; Euthym. 23.] The words τί πρὸς σε; imply a rebuke;—not perhaps however so sharp a one as has been sometimes seen in them. They remind Peter of the distinctness of each man's position and duty before the Lord; and the σὺ μὲς ἐκ., which follows, directs his view along that course of duty and suffering, which was appointed for him by his divine Master. Notice the emphatic expression of σέ, and the emphatic position of μοι: q. d. "His appointed lot is no element in thy onward course: it is me that thou must follow."

On the ἐὰν θέλω . . ., three opinions have been held (for that which refers the words to John's remaining where he then was, on the shore, till the Lord returned from His colloquy with Peter, is not worth more than cursory mention): (1) that of Aug., Maldon., Grot., Lampe, Olsh., &c. (it being allowed on all hands, that μίνειν means to remain in this life: see refl. and ch. xii. 34), 'If I will that he remain till I fetch him,' i. e. by a natural death. But this is frigid, and besides inapplicable here. Peter's death, although by the hands of an ἄλλος, was just as much the Lord's 'coming for him,' as John's, and there would thus be no contrast. (2) That that 'coming of the Lord' is meant which is so often in the three Gospels alluded to (see especially notes on Matt. xxiv.), viz. the establishment in full of the dispensation of the Kingdom by the destruction of the nation and temple of the Jews. This is the view of some mentioned by Theophyl., of Bengel (see below), Stier, Dräseke, Jacobi, &c.—and is upheld by the similar place, Matt. xvi. 28. (3) That the Lord here only puts a case,—"Even should I will that he remain upon earth till My last coming—what would that be to thee?" This view is upheld by Trench, Miracles, p. 466, edn. 2; but I think must be rejected on maturer consideration of the character of the words of our Lord, in whose mouth such a mere hypothetical saying would be strangely incongruous, especially in these last solemn days of his presence on earth. The second view seems then to remain, and I adopt it with some qualification. At the destruction of Jerusalem began that mighty series of events of which the Apocalypse is the prophetic record, and which is in the complex known as the 'COMING OF THE LORD,' ending, as it shall, with His glorious and personal Advent. This the beloved Apostle alone lived to see, according to ancient and undoubted tradition (Euseb. H. E. iii. 23). When De Wette (whom Lücke in the main follow see also Mr. Elliott, Apocal. Alf. p. 1 calls this interpretation 'gans nids' and would interpret this answer the current idea in apostolic times, t His coming was very near, he is suming (1) that this was the idea of Apostles themselves (see 2 Thess. ii. 2, 2 Pet. iii. 3, 4, 8, 9); (2) that answer is not that of our Lord, apocryphal. If all that he says ab the early expectations of the Church v granted, it would not follow that the v above taken is erroneous. And as to chapter having been written after the de of John and the destruction of Jerusal see below.

23.] τοὺς ἀδελφούς is expression of later date than any usu occurring in the Gospels. It is howe frequent in the Acts: see refl. ἐξῆλθ. εἰς (see refl.) is more in the m ner of the other Gospels. καὶ εἰπ. . . .] This καὶ is much in Jot manner, see ch. xvi. 32; not meaning i—rather, and yet.

duty over against that of Peter, who probably had already by following his Master through the Cross, glorified God, whereas the beloved disciple was, whatever that meant, to tarry till He came.

24, 25.] IDENTIFICATION OF THE AUTHOR, AND CONCLUSION. See remarks below.

24.] περὶ τούτων and ταῦτα certainly refer to the whole Gospel, not merely to the Appendix—and are quite in John's style:—see ch. xii. 41; ix. 31.

οἶδαμεν is in John's style—see reff.: also 1 John iv. 14, 16, al. fr. On ὅτι ἀλ. ἔστ. . . . see 3 John 12, and ch. v. 32.

25.] The purpose of this verse seems to be to assert and vindicate the fragmentary character of the Gospel, considered merely as a historical narrative:—for that the doings of the Lord were so many,—His life so rich in matter of record,—that, in a popular hyperbole, we can hardly imagine the world containing them all, if singly written down; thus setting forth the superfluity and cumbrousness of any thing like a perfect detail, in the strongest terms,—and in terms which certainly look as if fault had been found with this Gospel for want of completeness, by some objectors.

The reader will have perceived in the foregoing comment on the chapter a manifest leaning to the belief that it was written by John himself. Of this I am fully convinced. In every part of it, his hand is plain and unmistakeable: in every part of it, his character and spirit is manifested in a way which none but the most biased can fail to recognize. I believe it to have been added some years probably after the completion of the Gospel; partly perhaps to record the important miracle of the second draught of fishes, so full of spiritual instruction, and the interesting account of the sayings of the Lord to Peter;—but principally to meet the error which was becoming prevalent concerning himself. In order to do this, he gives a complete account, with all minute details,—even to the number of the fish caught,—of the circumstances preceding the conversation,—and the very words of the Lord Himself; not pretending to put a meaning on those words, but merely asserting that they announced no such thing as that he should not die. Surely nothing can be more natural than this. External evidence completely tallies with this view. The chapter is contained in all the principal MSS.: and there is no greater variety of reading than usual. In these respects it differs remarkably from John vii. 53—viii. 11, and indeed from even Mark xvi. 9—20. Internal evidence of style and diction is nearly balanced. It certainly contains several words and constructions not met with elsewhere in John; but, on the other hand, the whole cast of it is his;—the copulæ are his;—the train of thought, and manner of narration. And all allowance should be made for the double alteration of style of writing which would be likely to be brought about, by lapse of time, and by the very nature of an appendix,—a fragment,—not forming part of a whole written continuously, but standing by itself. The last two verses, from their contents, we might expect to have more of the epistolary form; and accordingly we find them singularly in style resembling the Epistles of John.

On the whole, I am persuaded that in this chapter we have a fragment, both authentic and genuine, added, for reasons apparent on the face of it, by the Apostle himself, bearing evidence of his hand, but in a 'second manner,'—a later style;—probably (as I think is shewn, inter alia, in the simplicity of the οἰμαι in ver. 25) in the decline of life. I cannot, with Luthardt, regard the last two verses as an addition by the Ephesian Church. If, as he thinks the οἰμαι favours this view, does not the οἰμαι as much disfavour it? Nor does the ingenious reasoning of Dr. Wordsworth all convince me that this chapter originally formed a part of the Gospel, or that the view here advocated arises from a "no apprehension of the connexion between the 20th and 21st chapters." His à priori reason, that had it been an appendix afterwards added, we should have had two distinct editions of the Gospel, where now all the MSS. contain it, is not reliable, in the uncertainty which rests on the origin of our present MSS., and also on the length or shortness of the interval during which it may have been wanting to the Gospel.

NOTE ON CH. V. 2.

AN interesting notice has been forwarded me respecting the probable locality of the pool of Bethesda. My correspondent believes that it must have been identical with Siloam, and thinks he has obtained evidence on the spot which renders this exceedingly probable. I subjoin an extract from his letter:—

"The excavation, near the Mosque of Omar, which from a comparatively recent date has been designated 'Bethesda,' lays claim to that title only from its proximity to the modern 'St. Stephen's Gate,' which is supposed to be near the site of the 'Sheep Gate' mentioned in Nehemiah, which again is only presumed to be the locality referred to in St. John as τὸ ἐκ τοῦ ποταμοῦ.

"The greater number of eye-witnesses reject this 'ditch of Antonia' on the evidence of a first impression, which being so general, is not to be despised. Dr. Robinson, the first to upset many similar legends, came at once to the conclusion, that wherever Bethesda had been, it was never in that ditch, and setting himself to discover a more probable substitute, unluckily pitched upon an even more unlikely spot, to wit, the 'Fountain of the Virgin,' which could never have been within Jerusalem or near to the 'Sheep Gate,' and, being a cave, into which you descend by a flight of steps, can by no stretch of imagination answer the requirements of a 'pool having five porches.' But he was directed to this spot from the singular coincidence presented by the phenomenon for which that fountain is celebrated. It seems curious that, having himself explored the narrow tunnel, which connects this cave with the well-established pool of Siloam; and having remarked that the pool, being supplied with water from the cave, necessarily shares the phenomenon, he should not have erected his porches upon the more eligible spot. For the Pool of Siloam for any thing to the contrary in Nehemiah or Josephus, might have been within the city wall; nay there is a strong probability that it was so, founded on the only intelligible use of the connecting conduit, namely, to supply the city with water in times of siege, and (as appears from its formation) without the knowledge of the besiegers. The solution seems to be that, as there was no necessity to upset the Pool of Siloam for the substitution of Bethesda or any thing else, its identity with any other spot never occurred to him.

"Dr. Kitto, who I believe never visited the places about which he so ably wrote, refused Robinson's theory, 1st, on the proper grounds of distance, and impossibility of porching the Virgin's cave; 2ndly, on the less reasonable objection of an inconsistency between a regular descent of the angel, and an irregular action of the syphon. But upon a reference to the original this second objection falls through, for the expression thus used, κατὰ καὶ πόρην, simply conveys the impression of recurrence, and indeed of translation 'at a certain season' does not seem to imply regularity.

"Armed therefore with Robinson's (in this respect) unimpeached hypothesis, and conceiving that a pool may have both a topographical and an eleemosynary designation—nay, concluding, that it had more names than one, from the expression ἐπιλεγομένη, we proceed to erect our σραός over this pool of Siloam, to see how better it will steer clear of Kitto's first, and more reasonable, objection. And lo! we find the requisites for such a structure appear (I would rather say have never disappeared),—the remains of four columns built into the (north) east wall of the pool, and the remains of four corresponding columns, yet visible down the centre of the pool, as in the subjoined sketch,— clearly showing that at a former period Siloam was half covered over. And it is something more than a coincidence, when we perceive that by such an arrangement the colonnade would be divided into exactly five equal portions, the whole being neither more nor less than a καλυμμένη πύλη σραός ἔχουσα. I need not say that this fact alone at sight, produced in my mind the strongest conviction.

"The taste of the water of Siloam resembles flat Seltzer, and from Wilde's narrative we find its analysis is as near as possible the same as Harrogate, which you are aware is famed as a specific in cutaneous disorders. Dr. Wilde mentions that the people about believe in the efficacy of this water, in similar diseases, particularly eye disorders; and of this I satisfied myself on the spot, though I was not fortunate enough to see it so used or to witness the bubbling.

"To this day such springs are as common in the East as with us. Invalids in great numbers resort to the hot springs at Tiberiye (Tiberias), and there is something of the kind at Panias (Caesarea Philippi). That the water should have been considered more efficacious immediately after the bubbling, seems not unnatural, and that such bubbling should have been ascribed to supernatural agency is much less so, when we remember, that the phenomenon defied explanation, until a quite late date,—at that date it could be scarcely supposed otherwise."

On this I may make one or two remarks, both by way of illustration, and as referring to objections which may be made to the supposition.

1. No meaning has ever been assigned to ἐν τῇ προβαταῦ which should affect this or any other view of the site of Bethesda.

2. It is perhaps hardly fair to lay stress on ἐν τοῖς ἱεροσολύμοις as implying that Bethesda was within the walls. The expression may be a wide one, as in ch. x. 22, Luke xiii. 4, Acts ii. 5, &c.

3. On the other hand the long and crooked tunnel connecting the two fountains, which Robinson explored, would seem as if it could have served no other purpose than that of a secret means of water-supply unknown to besiegers; and if so, then perhaps it may be allowable to claim for the words ἐν τοῖς ἱεροσολύμοις, as my correspondent does, the above meaning.

4. The fact of the two pools, the Fountain of the Virgin and Siloam, being simultaneously intermittent, was established by Robinson.

5. I am informed, that the "troubling of the pool" is exactly similar to what might be expected from a rush of water up through a narrow tunnel: and occurs at irregular intervals of from two or three days to a fortnight: depending on the quantity of rain that has recently fallen.

6. Robinson observed the drums of pillars under the water, but makes no comment on them, nor does he mention their number.

7. Irenæus, Hæc. iv. 8. 2, p. 236, says of our Lord, "Et Siloë etiam sæpe Sabbatis curavit: et propter hoc assidebant ei multi die Sabbatorum." And Prudentius (Contra Homuncionitas, 129 ff.) says:—

"Variis Siloæ refundit

Momentis latices, nec fluctum semper anhelat,

Sed vice distinctâ largos lacus accipit haustus.

Agmina languentum sitiunt spem fontis avari,

Membrorum maculas puro ablutura natatu:

Certatim interea roranti pumice rancas

Expectant scatebras, et sicco margine pendent."

And again, Enchiridion Vet. et Nov. Test. xxxiii.,—

"Morborem medicina latex, quem spiritus horis Eructat variis, fusum ratione latenti, Siloam vocitant: sputis abi conlita cæci Lumina Salvator jussit de fonte lavari."

8. We have nothing to do with the descent of the angel, nor with the extraordinary miraculous power in the water: the former existing only in the spurious passage, and the latter being merely implied as matter of popular belief in the speech of the paralytic, ver. 7: see note there.

9. One objection will suggest itself: if the pools of Bethesda and Siloam are one, why should St. John call it in ch. v. 2 by one name, and in ch. ix. 7 by another? An answer may perhaps be suggested: that the latter appellation is chosen by the Evangelist in ch. ix. 7, because of the mystical meaning there predicated of ὁ ἀρραβώνας ἀποκαλύπτει.
